Senator Flynn: I agree with the minister that he was objective in his comments to the journalist from Le Devoir. I am just asking him to be as objective with us as he was with him. According to the journalist, the minister, in that interview said that from now on the government should not intervene so much in mega-projects, because it had burned its fingers in the process. Does that mean that that is part of the reorientation or the revision of government policy?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, for a long while members of the opposition here, and some others—and I am not being critical of them for doing so—have tried to interpret our economic development strategy as being totally reliant on a series of mega-projects.

As I have so often tried to explain to my honourable friends, in my view, there are many economic development activities that will take place in this country, between now and the time frame at which the major projects committee was looking that do not fall into that category. In fact, I have said a number of times that perhaps 20 per cent or so would be in that category.

If the Honourable Leader of the Opposition is trying to perpetuate the idea, which is a figment of his and his colleagues' imagination, that our economic development strategy is based entirely, or even principally, on mega-projects, then again I have to say to him that that is not the impression that we have tried to leave.

Senator Flynn: Apparently, the journalist had that impression. Maybe you corrected it.

Senator Olson: Yes, I did.

Senator Flynn: In any event, I am glad you are correcting it now.

I have one last question I want to put to the minister. Of course, if I were to try to elicit very clear and concise answers I would have to spend the whole night, and probably without any success. I should like to refer again to the article in Le Devoir. They say that another major change affects especially the future of Gros Cacouna, about which everybody knows because it has been branded by the Liberal government as, if not a mega-project, at least a project interesting Quebec and especially the lower St. Lawrence. The Minister of State for Economic Development is purported to have declared that what has been found in the way of natural gas on or around Sable Island is so important that it may be that we will have a pipeline oriented towards the west rather than towards the east. I think Senator Smith put a question along those lines last week. Apparently, we will not need the gas from the Beaufort Sea but, rather, will use the gas which apparently has been found around Sable Island. It will be sent to central Canada rather than having gas from the west being shipped through the pipeline to the east.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am always encouraged by good news.

Senator Flynn: I did not say it was bad news.

Senator Olson: I do not think I went quite as far as the journalist attempts to indicate I did.

Senator Flynn: Again misquoted—poor you!

Senator Olson: I do complain sometimes when I am under-quoted or over-quoted.

Senator Flynn: But you are never quoted exactly.

Senator Olson: It is fairly obvious that, if the size of the discoveries which now appear at least potentially possible from Sable Island are correctly estimated, it may be economically feasible to bring that gas ashore sooner. These discoveries were made only in the last few days or weeks; certainly not very long ago. It is an encouraging sign. It may also be economically feasible to bring that gas in to serve the immediate east coast and perhaps some distance to the west. That makes sense.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary concerning the interview which Le Devoir arranged with the Minister of State for Economic Development. The article states that the Mr. Olson "who is considered as the leader of the conservative wing of the federal cabinet" intends to implement—

[English]

Senator Olson: I reject the question, because I do not accept that assertion.

Senator Roblin: You do not have to accept it; you just answer the question.

Senator Tremblay: My question will continue unless you object to any quotation reported by the journalist.

The article states that the minister said that at least a dozen departments are now working intensely on the review of the industrial strategy, and that the new industrial strategy will require the very close co-operation of the provinces. It also states that the Minister of State for Economic Development relies to a great extent on regional co-ordinators in the field.

I learned from that article that the fourth of those regional co-ordinators was recently appointed for Saskatchewan.

Senator Olson: Last Friday.

Senator Tremblay: My question is this: The minister has underlined the necessity for the co-operation of the provinces.

[Translation]

The other day, during a visit to eastern Quebec, the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé, the Prime Minister insisted, as he had before in other circumstances, that co-operative federalism was dead and that from now on the federal government would act unilaterally, without bothering to consult with the provinces.

It seems to me that between what the minister told the journalists and what the Prime Minister said—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Would you please specify your question?

Senator Tremblay: That is exactly what I am doing, because to be specific, my question needs a preamble, an introduction. If you keep on asking questions, I will have to add to it.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: This is not a preamble, it is a speech!

Senator Tremblay: In any case, I agree with the minister's position, and it seems to me that we, as consumers of government policy, must know whether there is any co-ordination within the government itself on its policies. Am I, in fact, to believe that the policy of the government, its real policy, is that expressed by the Minister of State for Economic Development, namely, co-operation with the provinces, or is it the position referred to by the Prime Minister himself, namely, unco-operative federalism, or a kind of parallel federalism, with all governments acting independently, without consultation?

● (2010)

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there are, in fact, several questions there. To answer the first one, the document, Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s, that we published with the budget papers in November, was never intended to be a complete blueprint with all the "i's" dotted and the "t's" crossed for every economic sector in Canada. Indeed, we described it—and I have so described it many times since—as an identification of the potential of the constraints, and of the priorities to deal with them, so that we can maximize the economic benefit to Canadians. We want to make it clear that there ought to be—and we say this in the paper—consultations with those sectors, and with the private sector generally, in order to give muscle to, or put flesh on, what is a bare-bones economic development strategy. We have made that clear. That is what I am talking about when I said there are a number of departments that are doing some work and having consultations to flesh out that policy.

Insofar as concerns the contradiction that my honourable friend tries to draw between what I said and what the Prime Minister said, let me say this to him: The federal government is prepared to do a number of things in economic development, but not necessarily on the basis used in the past, where each level of government shares a portion of the same project or the same task. It is useful to know what a provincial government's economic development strategies are so that you can get a common view of what the aims and objectives are—the end result that you are aiming at—and then we can work in concert rather than to have a different target. It seems to me if my honourable friend takes all of that into consideration, he will see that, first of all, there is no contradiction, and that it makes eminent good sense.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I think that the minister made a very interesting point about common objectives between the federal government and a provincial government in the perspective of economic development in that province. That was exactly the purpose, the meaning and the content of the so-called general agreements within the overall framework of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The Prime Minister has just announced, when speaking of the reorganization involving both the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Development, that those agreements will not be renewed.

Senator Roblin: That is right.

Senator Tremblay: He also announced the time at which they will expire.

Senator Olson: What he said was that there would be simpler agreements.

Senator Tremblay: If the general agreements are not renewed, it means that the common planning required in the legislation establishing the Department of Regional Development is no longer there. I am asking this question, and it is a precise question: Will that joint planning still be there?

It is not only a question of consultation; it is a question of a compulsory, agreed-upon plan. Those plans were spelled out in the general agreement. I am not speaking, at the moment, about the auxiliary agreements. If you read the general agreements, you will see that they are made up of the common strategy that was agreed upon between the two levels of government. I repeat my question: Will that joint planning still be there?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the easiest way to answer the question is to approach it in two respects. First, my honourable friend can find the answer clearly enunciated in the statement of the Prime Minister which was made, I believe, on January 12 of this year. At that time he announced what the reorganization changes were to be and, indeed, mentioned the fact that all of the general agreements and subsidiary agreements would be continued to their expiry dates.

It seems to me, however, that my friend could also have looked at one or two sentences in that statement where it was indicated that we would be entering into somewhat simpler agreements as opposed to the more complex and involved agreements that were entered into in the past.

Perhaps the best way to answer the question is to give an example, and I can think of two that are obvious. One concerns Nova Scotia Ocean Industries, where, indeed, there were eight components involved. Instead of going through all of the details in terms of the involvement of the federal government and of the provincial government in all eight components, an arrangement was made whereby the federal government undertook six of the eight components, paid for them in full and built them; the province took the remaining two.

The second example is a simpler arrangement having to do with the development of the transportation system and other aspects of the coal development in northeastern British Columbia and northwestern Alberta. There was a very complex set of negotiations under way regarding this project, in which the federal government and the provincial government were to be involved in building such things as the new townsite at Tumbler Ridge, the power lines, the roads, the inland railway, the port and all of the infrastructure required. However, the eventual outcome was somewhat more simple—and in this context I use the word "simple" as opposed to "complex". The federal government undertook to complete the entire port, which entailed the designing, the building and the financing of everything. The same thing applied to upgrading the capacity of the main line, and so on, through such agencies of the federal government as the CNR, the National Harbours Board, and so forth. The Government of British Columbia undertook the responsibility of building the entire townsite, the highways, the power lines and the inland railway, which involved the designing, the building and the financing of such things.

[Senator Tremblay.]

This is the sort of thing I am talking about. Certainly there were common objectives involved in the efforts of both levels of government. That is the point I am making.

The honourable senator asked specifically whether we can do anything regarding economic development in any province without the need for compulsory negotiations and, therefore, agreements. The answer to that question is: Yes, we can. We are going to carry out economic development whether there is 100 per cent agreement or not. However, it would certainly be advisable for us to have common objectives for the good of the people involved.

● (2020)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister on this matter of federal-provincial co-operation in economic development matters.

In his memorandum to cabinet entitled: "Priorities for Federal Government Economic Development Policies and Expenditures to the Mid-1980s," the minister says:

Management of the resource development and industrial reorientation projects will be of considerable and possibly mutual interest to provincial governments. The extent to which a joint planning approach is followed is likely to affect the speed and ease with which we will be able to undertake and successfully conclude major new projects.

Then the minister puts this question to his colleagues:

Should we actively endeavour to pursue a co-operative planning effort with a maximum federal visibility on delivery or should we primarily rely on federal spending and prerogative as a means to pursue these policies?

Will the minister say whether the cabinet came to a decision on that question which he put before them, and, if so, what the decision was?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no matter how many times, or from what angle, Senator Murray comes at me to persuade me to comment on a document that he does not legally have in his possession, I am not going to add credibility to it by commenting in one way or the other on these Fagin-like attempts.

Senator Roblin: You just will not answer, that is all.

Senator Tremblay: May I come back to the answer you have given to me through examples of the new approach you are describing? It is not at all what the Prime Minister said in the lower St. Lawrence region a week ago. I remember exactly, because I negotiated the agreements, the fields and sectors that were covered by the agreements signed in 1967 or 1968. The Prime Minister said to the people over there that the federal plan for that region, in the years to come, will cover exactly the same sectors. The only difference is that the federal and the provincial governments will just act separately instead of acting jointly. That is what he said.

Again, my question is: Where is the government policy? Is it in what I understand is your approach, of really co-operative action between the two levels of government, or is it a kind of parallel action as presented by the Prime Minister on a number of occasions, and especially last week in the lower St. Lawrence region?

Senator Olson: Well, my honourable friend, Senator Tremblay, is trying to draw a distinction that does not exist. That is unfortunate, because I suppose it is some kind of a shock to his logic to find that because he cannot see that what the Prime Minister said, and what I have just said to him, along with the statement of January 12, does not contain any conflict whatever. I am sorry that he cannot see that. Perhaps we will try and find some way of conveying that to him.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a short and very simple question, honourable senators. Do I understand, following this statement to Le Devoir by the minister, that the Gros Cacouna has no future, in the minister's mind, as far as his industrial strategy is concerned?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Olson: No, I do not think so.

Senator Asselin: Who said, "No"?

On a question of privilege. I was asking a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development, and I heard Senator Frith saying to Senator Olson, "Say 'No'".

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: You heard that?

Senator Asselin: I heard that.

Senator Frith: I may very well have said that. So what? I am entitled to address another senator if I wish. What is the matter with that? There is nothing in the rules against that.

Senator Asselin: The question was not addressed to you.

Senator Frith: But I did not give you the answer. I suggested an answer to Senator Olson.

● (2025)

Senator Flynn: I now have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Has he the responsibility to prompt replies from all the ministers? Is it within his mandate from the Prime Minister or the government? That seems to be the case, because this is not the first time it has happened—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: He is the only one—

Senator Flynn: —and now, with the noise coming from the other side—it is only noise; it is nothing sensible.

Senator Guay: He is the only one able to give an appropriate answer.

Senator Flynn: I agree with that. The honourable senator says that the deputy leader is the only one able to give an appropriate answer, and that the ministers are unable, without his help, to give appropriate answers. That is the honourable senator's view. Perhaps now I shall get a reply from Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is not part of my mandate to make suggestions to my colleagues. It is not part of my responsibility, and it has nothing to do with the Prime Minister. But it is my right to make suggestions to my colleagues which they sometimes accept and sometimes do not accept. I shall continue making them, if I wish to, and I am sure they will continue to accept them or not as they wish.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There is good team spirit over here.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to answer Senator Asselin's question. The answer is no. All it means is that great minds think alike.

Senator Asselin: Is Senator Frith's answer also no?

Senator Perrault: You could do with a little good advice on your questions.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It arises from an earlier answer which the minister gave to my leader with reference to the development of the so-called gas finds off or on Sable Island. He indicated, as I followed him, that it might be a find of such value that it would be desirable to transport the gas westward from Sable Island. I merely wish to clear up any doubt as to what he might have meant. I assume that his answer did not mean, in any way, that this possibility will have any effect upon the promised construction of the TQ&M pipeline from west to east into Nova Scotia.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I gave some projected dates indicating when it was expected to have the various sections of the TQ&M pipeline in place. I could go back over them, but my honourable friends opposite should recognize that if there are encouraging signs of there being a sufficient volume of gas to justify an economically feasible capability of bringing that gas ashore, then to say we would not make any change in the plans would be irresponsible. If there are indications—and there are—that there is sufficient volume to bring ashore to supply a number of requirements within essentially the same time frame, then that would be the responsible action to take.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable gentleman I would say that instead of answering my question he leapt at once to take offence, when all I was doing was asking for information. My question was designed simply to ascertain whether, if there were sufficient gas finds off Sable Island to make it commercially feasible to bring the gas ashore and, as he said, transport it westerly, that would have any adverse effect on the promised construction of the TQ&M pipeline from west to east. That is all I am asking. I am making no criticism or inference; I am asking for information.

• (2030)

Senator Olson: I do not think it would adversely affect the date on which a gas transmission system, by way of a mainline and laterals, would indeed be put in, whether they are fed from the east end or the from the west end.

Senator Smith: Thank you. Again, simply for information, may I ask, on the assumption of a commercially feasible find at Sable Island, whether the TQ&M pipeline would then be reversible so that it could be used to transfer gas either east or west, or would there have to be a separate pipeline in order to give satisfactory opportunity to transfer gas from both directions?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there has been a great deal of discussion about designing a reversible pipeline. Of course, there is some additional expense in designing such a line, and originally there was little chance of its being supplied from the eastern end. However, it seems to me that the sensible thing to do in the circumstances, and in light of the very encouraging seismic data that is now being gathered from the tests being made, is to give additional consideration to flowing gas either way as opposed to building the kind of telescopic line based on the assumption that the gas will be supplied from only one end.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his answer. I would point out to him that if he had bothered to understand the question, he would not have had to deliver the lecture which he started to deliver when I first asked him the question.

Senator Olson: I was just trying to demonstrate how sensible you are.

INDUSTRY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, would the minister be good enough to tell us, in view of the terrible disaster facing Dome Petroleum in the Beaufort Sea, whether it is true that the government of Mr. Trudeau is considering bailing out this company when Canada itself needs to be bailed out, taking account of the fact that billions of dollars each year are added to the deficit which, for this year, is in excess of $10 billion, as it has been in many recent years. Surely, it cannot be correct that the government is seriously considering bailing out this company.

The public would like to know the government's position on this matter, because hundreds of thousands of people are unemployed at the present time and many of them are walking the streets unable to get help and looking to the government for help. Does the minister agree that it would not only be a disaster, but a shocking thing to contemplate the government spending money that it does not have and that it must borrow to bail out this huge enterprise, in spite of all the nicer things that one could say about the efforts of this company. Does my friend have an answer to that question?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is commenting on what I think is press speculation. The government has made no comment with respect to the speculation on the financial status of Dome in general or the Beaufort Sea in particular.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Walker: But does my friend have any comments now as to what he expects the attitude of the government will be? The matter is before the government at this time, and has possibly been considered in cabinet. My friend must have some idea as to whether it is being contemplated. There is no use in the minister telling us when the situation is fait accompli. We would like the privilege of joining in the debate whenever, or if ever, the debate takes place.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, since my honourable friend has served in a cabinet, he will know that cabinet members do not comment on the discussion that takes place in cabinet, not even on the agenda that is before a cabinet meeting. Indeed, such comment would be considered a violation of the undertakings given by a member of cabinet.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has given the same reply every time I have been here in recent months. I have to ask him the question:

Upon what meat does this our Caesar feed,

That he is grown so great?

Little man that you are, over all these years—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Walker: I am talking about his attitude, not his physique.

I have watched the minister for years, and with the swelled head he is developing it is almost impossible to get him to answer any question with any sense of reasonableness. I have asked a question that is on the minds of millions of Canadians at the present time, and he has brushed it off and given me a lecture on cabinet behaviour, when I was in a cabinet long before he was ever heard of. I do not intend to take a lecture from the honourable senator—

Senator Olson: Nor do I from you.

Senator Walker: —because he is a would-be Caesar with a hell of a swelled head.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, neither do I intend to take that kind of a lecture from my honourable friend.

Senator Walker: You are going to take it.

Senator Olson: I am not going to take it. I am going to reject it, and that is all I can do. My honourable friend has talked about small people. If he used what little brain power he has, he would recall that he has no right to ask such questions of any minister. A minister cannot reveal what goes on in cabinet meetings. It is the smallest kind of assertion and attempt. Then he tries to belittle someone because he will not violate his oath, and that is the smallest of small comments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Hear, hear—and things are getting smaller.

Senator Walker: My friend has to wriggle out some way.

Senator Olson: That is a fact.

Senator Walker: He wriggles out of all the questions. At no time did I ask the minister to reveal any cabinet secret.

Senator Olson: That is what you asked me to do.

Senator Walker: I merely suggested that the honourable minister must have been considering this matter, and we want to know before it is too late. Does the government intend to spend money that it does not have to bail out this disaster, to help this company?

Senator Frith: You would never have answered that question yourself.

Senator Walker: Would I not?

Senator Frith: No. I have known you long enough to know that.

Senator Walker: In any event, that is my question and I would ask that the honourable minister be good enough to take it as notice because I intend to stay with it and ask it from time to time until I get an answer. I suggest that the minister stop this smart-aleck attitude of his.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Oh, oh!

Senator Walker: I would ask that Sonny Boy in the corner not talk that way.

Senator Guay: You are making a speech.

Senator Walker: I love to hear the honourable senator, because he makes me laugh.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I never dreamed on entering this house that Senator Walker would lower himself to talk about personalities in the way he has tonight. I never thought he would lower himself—

Senator Walker: Stick around.

Senator Guay: —to speak in the manner in which he just spoke to Honourable Senator Olson. I think it is awful for a senior member of this house to speak in that manner, and it sets a bad example for the newcomers.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not surprised at what has just taken place. Senator Walker will have to take responsibility for what he has said.

Senator Guay: That's right.

Senator Olson: But I can tell him that no matter how many times he asks me the question, and no matter how many angles from which he asks it, if he thinks that I will break my solemn oath, I can tell him that I will never do so even to satisfy his distorted thinking.

Senator Walker: That is a cheap trick. Nobody ever suggested that you should do such a thing.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That oath must have extended to a terrible lot of things because the honourable gentleman finds it possible to hide behind it on almost every question he answers.

Senator Frith: Come on, that is not fair.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEW CANADIAN EMBASSY, WASHINGTON, D.C.—AWARD OF ARCHITECTURAL CONTRACT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on May 12 by Senator Haidasz relating to the construction of a new Canadian Embassy in Washington.

I am informed that there are no Treasury Board regulations that require the use of Canadian construction companies to build embassies and/or chancery buildings in foreign countries. It is not considered practical to transport labour and construction equipment out of the country for such work, as much of the required equipment and labour can often be obtained more economically from host country suppliers and local labour markets. I am referring specifically to in-situ construction activities as opposed to supply of pre-fabricated and partially assembled components. Treasury Board is presently formulating policies relating to procurement of Canadian products for use in domestic construction projects, and consideration to the applicability of the policy to projects outside of Canada is one of the aspects under consideration in the formulation of the policy.

established the state as a kindly parent which would treat a young person in trouble with the law "not as a criminal but as a misdirected child requiring help, guidance and proper supervision." In the medical analogy of that time, delinquency was viewed as a disease and, accordingly, offenders were to be treated until they were cured. Treatment, informality, indeterminate disposition and wide discretion were viewed as essential components, whereas procedural regularity and due process were seen as factors which would interfere with that new approach. The change in attitude was considered an enlightened departure from former practice, but, unfortunately, in their zeal to emphasize treatment the reformers paid little attention to accountability and the legal rights of children.

However, in more recent years, particularly during the last couple of decades, concerned people have formed the opinion that treatment and rehabilitation can no longer stand on their own to serve society or to protect the better interests of children in a system which actually deals with offenders under the authority of the criminal law. It has also been argued that, as society insists more and more on young offenders accepting responsibility for their actions, their right to fair treatment in accordance with the principles of natural justice can no longer be left to the discretion of persons whose authority has been couched in such abstract terms.

The Juvenile Delinquents Act, which allows authorities very broad flexibility and discretionary powers in an effort to provide juveniles with help, guidance and proper supervision, has been seen as being too arbitrary and as lacking in adequate safeguards against the infringement of what, today, are recognized as the basic rights of citizens, regardless of age—namely, the right to due process of law and the right to participate in decisions affecting their futures.

The need for such reform has been recognized for several years—years which have seen extensive public discussion, intergovernmental consultation as well as consultation with professionals and practitioners in the juvenile justice field, and the publication of numerous reports on the topic.

Some honourable senators will recall that the first serious attempt to revise the Juvenile Delinquents Act occurred some 12 years ago with Bill C-192 in 1970. I recall being solicitor to an organization from Toronto which was very interested in the juvenile process. We had serious objections to some of the provisions of that act, as did many other individuals and organizations. That bill was given third reading, but then died on the Order Paper. Bill C-61 is the second and only subsequent attempt to revise the law, and I hope it will finally be successful in revising the Juvenile Delinquents Act. The very lengthy period of time which has elapsed during the development of this proposed legislation is indicative of the complexity of the task and the formidable challenge which faces legislators who grapple with the task of developing a system of justice for adolescents.

As the Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Robert Kaplan, pointed out when moving second reading of Bill C-61 in the other place, in spite of the good intentions of the framers of the act, several provisions in the Juvenile Delinquents Act,

● (2040)

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

She said: Honourable senators, it is my great pleasure to speak to you this evening with respect to Bill C-61, the Young Offenders Act, which after long and careful study in the other place recently received unanimous approval on third reading. The subject has been of great interest and concern to me for more years than I care to remember, because many long days ago I worked as a volunteer in the juvenile courts of Toronto. Thus, I am well aware of some of the provisions that have caused the anguish and problems we are now trying to correct.

As you will have noticed, Bill C-61 is long and complex. If it becomes law, as I hope it eventually will, it will significantly affect the lives of the many young people who come in conflict with federal laws and regulations. I hope you will forgive me, therefore, if I take up your time to give you some history and background with respect both to our existing law, the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and this proposed legislation which will replace it.

Until 1908 a child who broke the law appeared in adult court regardless of his or her age and vulnerability. Children in the early years of this century could expect little benevolence from authority. There were no labour laws to protect child workers or education acts to ensure minimum schooling.

In 1908, when the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the present act, was passed, it was based on the parens patriae doctrine, and as well as a number of deficiencies, have created and perpetuated injustices for young people which we can no longer condone.

Let me just list some of the more obvious inequities: discriminating against young persons by arbitrarily labelling them "juvenile delinquents" for behaviour which more properly needs to be dealt with in the domain of child welfare and youth protection legislation; criminalizing young people for various acts of behaviour which are not considered illegal in adults; subjecting young persons to indeterminate court sentences which may not reflect the seriousness, or perhaps the relative triviality, of the offence committed—sentences which are often more severe than an adult would receive in similar circumstances; subjecting young persons to an arbitrary review process by which they will be brought back before the court at any time until they reach the age of 21 years, at which time new sanctions may be applied, including even a belated transfer to adult court—which is tantamount to double jeopardy, and that has traditionally been against our principles of justice at least insofar as they apply to adults; subjecting young persons to informal court procedures and decisions without guaranteeing them the right to legal counsel and full opportunity to challenge their accusers.

I should like to stress, however, that this recital of some of the most obvious inequities and deficiencies in the Juvenile Delinquents Act is in no way intended as casting a reflection on the daily practices of the juvenile courts of this country or upon our judiciary and provincial administrators who have had to struggle with the inherent weaknesses of the existing law and in most cases have managed to use compassion and sound judgment in interpreting and extending its rigid limits so as to give the greatest possible protection and assistance to young people.

Honourable senators, I should like to reiterate that the substantive provisions in the proposed legislation largely reflect the views and positions of provinces, juvenile justice professionals, as well as interested groups and individuals that were submitted to the federal government during the lengthy consultation process. Needless to say, unanimity of views on all aspects was not possible, and there remain specific differences among those concerned with respect to particular aspects of the bill. Indeed, it would be Utopian to expect that all interested parties could be fully satisfied; yet, the bill does represent a substantial degree of consensus.

After the bill received second reading in the other place, it was referred to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee which, during the course of 17 careful and exhaustive hearings, received many briefs and heard about 40 witnesses, representatives of both individuals and groups with various legal and professional interests. While the witnesses were generally supportive of the proposed legislation, they all offered suggestions to improve, clarify or tighten its provisions.

The Solicitor General and his departmental officials followed the proceedings closely and sympathetically, and, at the conclusion of the hearings, proposed a series of amendments to meet most of the desires of the committee and the witnesses. All of the many amendments adopted by the committee in the other place were then passed unanimously on third reading, although, in fairness, I must state that even some members who voted for the bill on third reading expressed reservations with respect to certain of its provisions.

The feeling was obvious, however, that it represents such a major step forward in the administration of justice for young people that it was vital not to delay its passage any longer in the hope of achieving perfection, and that it would be preferable to monitor the future administration of the legislation in order to correct imperfections as they are perceived in practice.

The new legislation is aimed at providing a comprehensive process for dealing with juvenile crime that encourages respect for the law and promotes the wellbeing of both young offenders and society. The key principles which underlie the proposed Young Offenders Act are:

That young persons should be held more responsible for their behaviour, but not wholly accountable since they are not yet fully mature;

That society has a right to protection from illegal behaviour;

That young persons have the same rights to due process of law and fair and equal treatment as adults, and that these rights must be guaranteed by special safeguards; and

That young persons have special needs because they are dependents at varying levels of development and maturity and, therefore, also require guidance and assistance.

These principles reflect the federal government's intent to strike a reasonable and acceptable balance between the needs of young offenders and the interests of society.

Let me highlight some of the main provisions contained in the proposed legislation which seeks to implement these principles. Perhaps the most significant feature of the proposed Young Offenders Act is the abolition of the omnibus offence of delinquency itself which comprises a range of so-called status offences which we would now be inclined to characterize as misbehaviour. Under the new legislation a young person can only be charged with a specific offence against the Criminal Code or other federal statutes and regulations.

The proposal more realistically delineates the jurisdiction of responsibility of the federal and provincial governments under the Constitution and, as well, reflects the practice developed in many jurisdictions of decriminalizing behaviour which is not seen as being sufficiently serious to rationalize its continued inclusion under the criminal law.

A second important provision is that the age of criminal responsibility will be raised from seven to twelve. I doubt that anyone would disagree that seven is much too young an age at which to attribute criminal responsibility and that children so young should more realistically be the subject of non-criminal proceedings. Twelve appears to be an age when the average young person should be able to differentiate between a criminal act and some lesser offence and also be able to take some personal responsibility for his or her actions.

The most significant and generally voiced criticism of Bill C-61, as it was tabled in the House of Commons on February 16, 1981, was with respect to the maximum age provision. As you may recall, it provided variable limits in order to conform with existing provincial legislation. During the committee hearings in the other place, the federal government was urged to resolve the issue of age disparity by establishing a maximum age that would be uniformly applied throughout the country. Even the provinces, although not able to agree on a given age level, recognized that uniformity is desirable.

I should like to add that, quite apart from the general support for uniformity, it is the view of the Solicitor General of Canada and of the Minister of Justice, given the proclamation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as part of the Constitution Act, 1981, that any juvenile delinquency legislation, including the present Juvenile Delinquents Act, could be ruled in breach of the equality provisions of the charter.

The selection of particular age at which to establish a uniform maximum age was a difficult one. However, in recommending that Bill C-61 be amended to provide for a uniform maximum age of 18, the Honourable Robert Kaplan gave what he believed to be the most persuasive reasons for his selection. They were:

Full maturity is not, as a general rule, achieved until age 18 or even later, particularly in current times because of the prolonged period of dependency that is often required of young persons;

Young persons, because of their impressionability and tendency to copy their so-called peers, need to be protected for as long a period as possible from entry into adult correctional institutions where they will be exposed to older, more experienced offenders;

Since rights as well as responsibilities will be imposed on young persons under the proposed new system of juvenile justice, the benefits of the system should then be extended to the largest possible number of young persons who have not yet attained full maturity. The full benefit of the resources of the juvenile justice system, with its greater emphasis on individual needs than the adult system affords, should be extended to young persons up to the age of 18 because they are, until then, still in their formative years and at an age level where they can be favourably influenced by positive action and guidance.

Given sufficient protective safeguards for society, which it is believed the new act contains, it is preferable to set the age at a higher rather than at a lower level. One of those safeguards is the retention of the transfer provision to adult court for such difficult cases as the "mature" criminal who is under 18 or the offender who has committed an extremely serious offence.

This age level of 18 is more consistent with our civil law. The fact that no province in Canada has an age of civil majority below the age of 18 years is recognition that most young persons under the age of 18 have not yet attained full maturity.

[Senator Neiman.]

The recognition that age 18 represents the most reasonable point of division between youth and adulthood is consistent with the situation prevailing in most European and western democracies, and in most common law jurisdictions, including a high proportion of states in the United States of America.

Needless to say, the federal government is very cognizant of the service, resource and financial implications for the provinces and territories in establishing such a uniform maximum age. Nevertheless, the establishment of uniformity at under 18 years of age represents the most objectively beneficial and defensible position, and the option which provides the best long-term solution for Canadian society generally and our young people in particular.

One particular feature of the proposed legislation is the acknowledgement that alternative measures to the court process can be used in appropriate cases. It has been recognized for some time that many young persons are brought to court unnecessarily when other effective ways may exist to deal with them. Such alternatives, which have become popularized in the form of screening and diversion, are not intended as a substitute for the judicial process but rather to provide additional options for dealing with young persons who commit offenses.

Informal and discretionary pre-judicial processes have become part and parcel of juvenile justice policy and administration in Canada. Police discretion has, for instance, been a fundamental cornerstone in the administration of justice for years. Probation and social service personnel make and accept referrals, and undertake to initiate alternative agreements and programs with offenders, all in the interest of settling disputes and avoiding the utilization of formal court proceedings. Such approaches not only avoid unnecessary referrals to courts, but can offer the young person the opportunity to accept responsibility for his or her behaviour and to become voluntarily involved in the resolution of his or her wrongdoing, frequently with the victim being involved.

However, there remain many concerns about the inherent dangers of exercising unfettered discretion in the application of diversion programs. Some arguments have been put to the effect that the federal government should make diversion mandatory and more explicit. In my view, the proponents of such arguments fail to recognize the importance of the right of the juvenile to plead not guilty, and the role of the provinces in exercising their prosecutorial discretion. The decision of when and how to use alternative measures is better left to the provinces which can then develop programs to suit the particular and local circumstances.

As a result, the legislation does contain a number of conditions and safeguards which must be applied so as to protect young persons against potential abuses and arbitrary action. For example, the young person will now have the right, and must be given the opportunity, to consult legal counsel before agreeing to any diversion program. Alternative measures cannot be used in any case unless there exists sufficient evidence to proceed with the prosecution of an offence. The young person must freely consent to participate, but retains the option of having the matter dealt with by the court. The young person is protected against double jeopardy in the event of subsequent court proceedings.

Another of the deficiencies in the existing law is in regard to its disposition or sentencing provisions. The proposed legislation would directly address the outdated and inadequate features of present sentencing policies by furnishing the youth court with a range of dispositions which delineate not only the overall shift in the philosophy of the proposed act, but, more specifically, address currently accepted sentencing principles.

Accordingly, Bill C-61 proposes a precisely defined range of sentencing options which will take into account the special circumstances and needs of young persons while allowing sufficient scope and flexibility to provide for the rights and needs of victims, as well as to address the need to protect society in appropriate cases. Increased emphasis will be placed on formalizing in law, community-based dispositions such as community service, compensation and restitution orders, as methods of instilling in the offender a greater sense of responsibility and understanding of his illegal behaviour.

With respect to victims, it should be noted that amendments to the bill have strengthened their position by allowing them to appear before the court to make representations regarding restitution or compensation, and by providing that they be notified of the terms and conditions of any restitution or compensation order. These dispositions would be in addition to those of a supervisory nature, such as probation orders where special conditions and requirements could be attached. Other dispositions would include an absolute discharge or the application of a fine which, under the proposed legislation, could reach a maximum of $1,000, as compared to the $25 limit under the present law.

Under the new legislation, the use of custody will be seen as a final resort which, when contemplated, is to be exercised with utmost restraint. When it is being considered, it should reflect the seriousness of the factors attendant on a specific offence or offences.

The youth court judge, who is considering custody for an offender, must request a pre-disposition report. Reasons must be given by the court for all dispositions. Custodial dispositions will be for a definite period of time and will not, for most offences, exceed two years in duration for a given offence, nor can they exceed the maximum period for which an adult could be sentenced. Serious offences for which an adult would be liable to life imprisonment will carry a maximum term of three years.

When Bill C-61 was tabled in the other place it left the determination of the level of custody, as well as the choice of facility or placement, to provincial administrators. However, strong representations were made in a number of briefs to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place, and in direct submissions to the Solicitor General of Canada to the effect that the determination of the level of custody, involving as it does the liberty of the young person and the protection of society, should more properly be left to the judiciary in the forum of the open court.

While the issue is not without controversy because of the objections of a number of provinces that wish to retain greater administrative discretion, the Solicitor General recommended an appropriate amendment, amongst the many amendments he submitted to the committee of the other place at the conclusion of its hearings, in order to give the youth court the authority to designate the level of custody as between "open custody" and "secure custody." Pursuant to the amendments, the provincial administrators will have the discretion to designate the facility or placement within the level specified by the court and to move offenders between institutions and programs at a given level.

It is the intent of the new act that the progress and welfare of young persons who receive custodial or other types of dispositions should be subject to continuing attention and monitoring during the term of the disposition. There will be a mandatory review in the case of any custodial disposition exceeding one year.

Contrary to the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is silent on the matter, the new legislation contains provisions regulating the creation, maintenance, confidentiality and use of juvenile court records. Under the present legislation, it is possible for an individual to carry the label "delinquent" well beyond his youth and, indeed, possibly for life. Although young offenders are intended to take responsibility for their illegal behaviour, the consequences for them are not intended to be as severe as those applied to adults in the ordinary courts. Therefore, when a young offender has completed his or her sentence and has committed no further offence for a qualifying period, the record will be destroyed. The young person will thus be given a fresh start. It is hoped that this provision will provide a young person with a major incentive to mend his or her ways.

In determining the responsibility of young persons under new legislation, it is recognized that they have particular rights and freedoms, including the right to be heard and to participate in the processes that lead to decisions that effect them, as well as the opportunity to be informed of their rights as guaranteed under the law.

We can no longer operate under a system of procedural irregularity when a young person's freedom and liberty are at stake, nor should a young person be exposed to the sanctions of the criminal law without, at the same time, receiving the benefits of the built-in protections it has to offer. A young person must be given the opportunity to defend himself and to be judged in accordance with the principles of natural justice. No longer can we dispense with such fundamental rights because they are seen to conflict with treatment and rehabilitation ideologies, nor can we allow the exercise of unfettered discretion in dealing with young persons.

Under the proposed legislation, the young person will have the right to retain and instruct counsel at all stages of proceedings. Special safeguards will be established in order to assure proper and equitable practices in the taking of statements. Parents will be notified of any arrest, detention and court appearance respecting their child and will be granted the opportunity to participate in the proceedings. Rules of evidence and procedure will provide the opportunity to challenge the Crown's case and to present a defence. Furthermore, and most importantly, young persons will be granted the same rights of appeal as are available to adults.

I trust that this rather lengthy exposé will give you some insight into, and appreciation of, the efforts being made by the federal government to improve the administration of juvenile justice in a realistic and compassionate manner. The proposed legislation has already undergone many beneficial changes and improvements, in response to the views and recommendations expressed throughout a lengthy consultation process and as a result of the in-depth study it received in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the other place. When it has passed second reading in this chamber, I intend to ask that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, where I am sure it will receive the same careful consideration.

Even in the light of all of the care that has been and will be taken in the formulation and subsequent administration of this legislation, I do not suggest that it is perfect or that it will not require modification from time to time, as experience and changing conditions indicate. It will, however, bring us significantly closer to the achievement of a desired balance between the prime objective of criminal law, which is to protect the public from criminal behaviour, and the desirability of ministering to the special needs of young persons who come into conflict with the law.

I therefore urge all members of this chamber to lend their support to this long-awaited and very worthwhile legislative reform.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Neiman on her thorough exposé of the very difficult bill which is before the Senate. I wish to read over her presentation before answering to it tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate in the name of Senator Lafond.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

[Senator Neiman.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE RESPECTING WHEAT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Sub-Committee of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group respecting wheat, held in Washington, D.C., U.S.A., on October 23rd and 24th, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Sparrow).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Sparrow advised me that he has spoken to the proposer of this inquiry, whose name I cannot remember at the moment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is the inquiry about wheat?

Senator Frith: It has to do with the meeting of the Sub-Committee of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group respecting wheat, yes.

Senator Roblin: In that case, I have to accept the responsibility, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: I understood that Senator Sparrow had spoken to you, that he does not want to speak to the matter, and that it is satisfactory that it be treated as having been debated, unless you wish to close the debate on it.

Senator Roblin: No, I have said all I wish to say. I am, quite naturally, willing to have Senator Sparrow deal with it as he sees fit.

Senator Frith: The question, I suppose, is whether we are certain that no other senator wishes to speak to it. Shall we leave the matter until tomorrow, with that warning? Senator Sparrow says that, as far as he is concerned and if you agree, he would be happy to have it treated as having been debated. It is your inquiry, however, and we would not want to do that without your consent.

Senator Roblin: I think I have no rights in the matter. It is up to members of the Senate to speak if they want to. I do not think my agreement is necessary, and I would not really wish to have it thought that it is.

Senator Frith: Then, honourable senators, I suggest that this order be treated as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang, pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 20, 1982, moved:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.

He said: Honourable senators, I feel very humble tonight, after having received such an insight into and appreciation of juvenile problems with justice in Canada. The erudition with which our honourable colleague delivered that dissertation puts me at a tremendous disadvantage when I try to move into such a mundane matter as the subject of the motion I have put before you. As the time is now 9.36, I will attempt to shorten my remarks tonight—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, no!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, we have no adjournment time.

Senator Lang:—within the ambit of the importance of the subject matter.

I think I might start, honourable senators, by advising you that on May 23—that is, last Sunday—a telex was sent by Senator Forsey to Premier Peckford of Newfoundland, and if I may, I would like to read it:

The Dominion Government's action is, as far as I know, unprecedented. It is in marked contrast to the procedure that government itself followed on the patriation resolutions. It is certainly irregular. It interferes with the normal judicial procedure by virtually removing from the Newfoundland Court of Appeal an essential part of the question placed before it. It is highly improper. It is a tactic that undermines the whole judicial system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I do not need to tell you that I did not know Senator Forsey was even thinking about these matters until I found this on my desk this morning. I will repeat what he said:

The Dominion Government's action is, as far as I know, unprecedented.

With regard to the qualification "as far as I know," I have now done all the research possible within 12 hours, and I can confirm that the government's action is in fact unprecedented.

Senator Flynn: Indeed.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, if I could give you a small perception of the course of events that led to this matter last week, it may help you understand my concerns, and perhaps, as certain senators from Newfoundland—and it is their concern, really; not mine—were unable to do, trigger the conscience of some of my colleagues on the other side of the house.

In terms of recent history, the Government of Newfoundland referred this matter to the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland by order in council dated February 12 last. As honourable senators know, under section 6 of the Judicature Act of Newfoundland is a legal and proper procedure. I need not remind you that under section 37 of the Supreme Court of Canada Act, there is a provision that an appeal lies from a judgment, under such circumstances, by a provincial supreme court to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Government of Canada referred this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada by order in council dated May 19, which was last Wednesday, in accordance with section 55 of the Supreme Court Act.

That is the background against which I would like to paint this picture.

There is more to this story than I have related. It is a sad story, and a story that reveals the state into which we have fallen in Canada, both governmentally and judicially.

Early in 1981 there was an appeal to the Federal Court on a question from the Canada Labour Relations Board involving the certification of a union, namely, the Seamen's International Union, with respect to jurisdiction for the purposes of certification of seamen on boats, serving, among other things, the oil rigs off the coast of Newfoundland.

This was, honourable senators, a straightforward matter for judicial determination as to whether that matter fell under the heading of property and civil rights, which is a matter within provincial jurisdiction, or, on the other hand, under the heading of shipping, which is a matter within federal jurisdiction.

The next thing that happened, honourable senators, was this. On June 19 of last year, the federal attorney general intervened in that litigation in an attempt to introduce, into the narrow issue involved, the question of ownership of natural resources. You will see that we are now starting to play games.

Senator Flynn: So what else is new?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Peckford started that.

Senator Lang: May I have quiet on the other side while I am delineating my premise?

From then until January 25, 1982, negotiations between Newfoundland and the federal government continued, and during that period the matter escalated politically.

I am not going to blame the federal government, nor am I going to blame the provincial government, but I can say to both of them that they are incompetent.

Finally, on February 12 last, the Federal Court, in its wisdom, refused to deal with the offshore issue as a matter properly before it on the narrow question of jurisdiction with regard to the certification of a union. One of the parties then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Supreme Court of Canada refused to give leave to appeal—in my opinion, very properly. I have here the words of Mr. Justice Thurlow, who said:

● (2130)

The question of ownership should not be addressed or answered except and to the extent that it becomes necessary to do so.

In other words—this is my interpretation—Mr. Justice Thurlow was saying, “Don’t try to politicize our judicial system.”

Newfoundland, if my information is correct, was frustrated, first, by the federal government’s denial of a previous agreement to acknowledge joint ownership; and having reneged on joint management—a commitment given in May—that was followed by the federal government’s assertion of sovereignty, in December 1981. Finally, the federal-provincial agreement to support an application to adjourn the SIU appeal was renounced by the federal government on February 1, 1982. Then, after an offer by Newfoundland, on February 10, 1982, to set aside sovereignty as an issue—it sounds to me like the Falkland Islands dispute—the federal government went silent.

Under those circumstances, advisedly or not, the Newfoundland government referred the matter to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland—and that, of course, is the only judicial recourse it has. It cannot refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada. That was done on February 12 last.

On the other hand, the federal government, frustrated by an inability to effect its purpose by injecting the question into the narrow issue as to certification powers of a union, referred the same question—I underline the words “same question”—to the Supreme Court of Canada on May 19.

No doubt I and other honourable senators will be rebutted to the effect that it was not the same question. But, honourable senators, it does not take much insight to know that one question decides the other, and any attempt to obfuscate that fact is a mere scam.

Let me, as an example, quote the Prime Minister’s telex to the Premier of Newfoundland, in which he stated:

—the federal government has today asked the Supreme Court of Canada to rule on the question of whether Canada or Newfoundland has ownership of and jurisdiction over the Hibernia Field.

All of the press statements referred to Hibernia, and Hibernia alone. The area governed by the federal question, in its reference, is much larger than Hibernia. In fact, the area covered by the reference is 820 square miles, and the Hibernia field comprises some 35 square miles, or 4.25 per cent of the area. The area also contains the Nautilus structure—I am not an engineer—which is being drilled with encouraging results; the main part of the Hebron field, tested at over 9,000 barrels of oil per day; part of the Ben Nevis, West Ben Nevis and Terra Nova structures, and the Ben Nevis was tested at 1,857 barrels of oil per day. Those structures are the ones that have been identified to date. Others may be expected within the 830 square mile area.

The fact that the Hebron, Ben Nevis and West Ben Nevis and Terra Nova structures straddle the boundaries of the area proves that one cannot have ownership of one part without determining the ownership of the whole. So any suggestion that the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada by the federal government is on a different subject matter from that before the Supreme Court of Newfoundland is, to my mind, a complete scam.

[Senator Lang.]

The questions involved are absolutely the same. The determination of the question of one reference will affect the determination on the other. If, for instance, the federal government had been intellectually honest and said it was really concerned about this area called Hibernia, why did it not go to Newfoundland and say, “Look, let us limit your reference before the provincial supreme court to that area”? No, it did not do that. It immediately ran to the Supreme Court of Canada, and justified its action by saying the reference did not involve the same subject matter.

Honourable senators, I sometimes wonder what this government is up to, or is it just too incompetent to know what it is up to, or to realize what it is doing—or is it dangerously authoritarian to the extent that it can threaten our judicial and legislative processes?

The constitutional exercise, which we went through last year and this year—or, to use my own term, the constitutional scam that we went through, because we have only an amended B.N.A. Act passed by the Parliament of Westminster—the court references that were invoked, and the imposition of a bill of rights upon our system, have dangerously politicized our judicial system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lang: The methodology involved—which involves federal-provincial confrontation—has been nearly disastrous. Does this government now intend to go further, until we have confrontation between provincial courts and the federal courts? Is this the game it is playing in this country? It makes me wonder whether we have a Falkland Islands incident coming up over Newfoundland, and another over St. Pierre and Miquelon. Once we start to pit our federal and provincial courts against each other, we shall start to see the breakup of the judicial system we have known in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I am from Ontario. Ownership or control of the Newfoundland offshore resources is, to my mind, basically an academic problem. I am not concerned about what happened in the House of Commons last week, or what the minister said with respect to this matter, or when he said it. What I am deeply concerned about is the effect of this on the role of our judiciary as it fits into our system of government.

● (2140)

May I try some examples on you? This is not a matter to be taken lightly by anyone. We are right at the heart of whether we exist with the form of government we have known. Assume, for instance, that a constitutional issue comes before the Supreme Court of Ontario and that, before it is adjudicated upon by that court, the federal government refers that same matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. Suppose that the Supreme Court of Ontario adjudicates with one result and, without the matter being under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Supreme Court of Ontario, the Supreme Court of Canada adjudicates differently. We would have no rule of law any more; we would have legal chaos.

I do not need to remind honourable senators that inherent in our system is the appellate structure. There is a trial on a reference, then there is appeal and, depending on the matter under adjudication, there may be a further appeal. When the executive of this country begins to short-circuit this appellate system, though it may be legal under the Supreme Court Act and under the provincial courts acts, it blows a fuse. What is even worse is that it gives a public perception to the notion that our courts can be manipulated—provincial courts by provincial governments and federal courts by federal governments. That is a false perception, and you and I know that.

However, the fact that such a perception may be engendered by these proceedings can completely destroy the system. It is the perception of the people of their judicial system that is important. The independence of our judiciary and its supposed immunity to contempt are the cornerstones that I feel our democracy and our freedom rest upon. The process with which we are now faced when this motion to the Supreme Court of Canada returns next Friday, in my opinion, is an insult to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and a slur of contempt on the Supreme Court of Canada. Trite as it may sound, the price of our freedom is eternal vigilance.

I hope I have made the point of my motion clear. Our judiciary and its independence is part of that freedom.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Lang: Yes.

Senator Godfrey: Ever since I have been here, both in committees and in the house—and this is the first time I have ever asked such a question in the house—when people use lingo, I have always asked myself what they mean by the lingo. Would the honourable senator define the word “scam”, so that we will know what he is talking about?

Senator Lang: It is the technique used by a magi.

Senator Godfrey: The honourable senator referred to Senator Forsey and the fact—

Senator Flynn: Will you be speaking later on?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): He is asking a question.

Senator Flynn: Let him defend himself. He does not need you.

Senator Godfrey: The honourable senator referred to Senator Forsey and the fact that there had not been a case before the supreme court of a province and the Supreme Court of Canada at the same time. Can the honourable senator tell us how many constitutional references the federal government has made in the past directly to the Supreme Court of Canada as compared to the number of constitutional references made by provinces to the provincial courts of appeal?

Hon. G. I. Smith: What does that have to do with the matter?

Senator Godfrey: A lot. I am merely asking the honourable senator whether he has done his research in that respect.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you do your own research?

Senator Godfrey: I think his answer will indicate that the usual practice in constitutional matters is that they go straight to the Supreme Court of Canada. I am asking the honourable senator a straight question of fact, and whether he has done his research.

Senator Flynn: I am not preventing him from answering it.

Senator Godfrey: I am not asking you. I am asking the Honourable Senator Lang, and I think he should be allowed to give his answer without interruption. If he has not done the research, then, fine, somebody else can do it.

● (2150)

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it seems that—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Senator Lang did not answer.

Senator Asselin: Does Senator Lamontagne want to say something?

Senator Lamontagne: Senator Lang did not reply.

Senator Asselin: He does not have to reply.

Senator Flynn: He does not have to reply.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Does Senator Asselin wish to speak on the motion?

Senator Flynn: Yes, it is about the motion.

Senator Asselin: I was not aware that my honourable friend, Senator Robichaud, had become Speaker of this House and was trying to control the debate and determine whether we are speaking about this or that subject. In any case, he will have a chance to voice his views.

Senator Robichaud: As far as I am concerned, you are very easy to manage.

Senator Asselin: Well, this has seldom happened since your appointment to the Senate because it is the first time that I have heard you speak.

Senator Robichaud: You say that so often that it is becoming repetitive.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, the events of last week have caused some alarm in the legal community. I want to congratulate Senator Lang for having given such a clear explanation of the legal aspects of a political issue. I believe that he did so with much impartiality and that this will enrich this debate and enlighten us about the problem now before the Senate.

When you have practised law for some time, you are surprised to see that a democratic government like the one we have in Canada can try to negotiate a political issue through the legal system. For many years, it has been suggested that this process has been used to settle disputes between various levels of government. For the last several years, there has been an increasing tendency to somehow abandon the process of political negotiation of political problems opposing the federal government and the provinces. This has happened in many cases since this government has been trying to settle conflicts with the provinces. While the law provides that the federal government can refer issues to the Supreme Court to get its opinion about the constitutionality of a contentious matter, we have the impression that the federal government is progressively attempting to shift its activities and its relations with the provinces towards legal solutions rather than trying to find political answers through negotiations.

However, when the population of Newfoundland expressed its views democratically about the ownership of its offshore resources during the last election, I believe that the answer was quite clear and specific. On the other hand, Mr. Lalonde had stated during the campaign that even if Newfoundland replied by an affirmative and undeniable vote, this would have no effect on the negotiations already taking place between Newfoundland and the federal government. Honourable senators, this was a very negative attitude taken beforehand by the minister responsible for negotiating this contentious issue with the Government of Newfoundland.

In any case, the people of Newfoundland gave their premier the clear, specific and undeniable mandate of seeing to it that the ownership of these offshore resources would be respected. What happened? The premier submitted the issue to the Appeals Court of Newfoundland. If my information is correct, this case could be debated before the Appeals Court next fall.

Senator Robichaud: In October.

Senator Asselin: During October the question of ownership of the offshore natural resources off Newfoundland was referred to the Newfoundland Appeal Court. This was the normal process which the Newfoundland government could use to obtain a legal decision. Even though it is contended the subject matter referred to the Supreme Court is more specific, its object is essentially the same. The same basic issue raised before the Newfoundland Appeal Court will be raised in the Supreme Court.

Why then has the federal government decided to set aside the entire appellate system which is normally used at the provincial as well as the federal level. If I am not satisfied with a judgment rendered by the Quebec Superior Court, I can always refer the matter to the Quebec Appeal Court. If I am not happy with the decision of the Appeal Court, I can ask the Supreme Court for leave to appeal the judgment of the Appeal Court.

Senator Lamontagne: You are not the federal government.

Senator Asselin: I am not the federal government, as Senator Lamontagne quite rightly stated. Had I been the federal government, I would not have acted in the same way. As I said, even though the federal government has the legal power to make a reference to the Supreme Court on a matter of policy to resolve a difference between various levels of governments or a contentious issue at the federal level—even though they have the legal right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Canadian government still has an obligation to also respect institutions at the provincial level.

Now, as Honourable Senator Lang said, the Supreme Court of Newfoundland already had before it the contentious matter. Without waiting for that court's decision, they hurriedly invoked the provisions of the Supreme Court Act to short-circuit the decision that might be taken by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and they immediately applied to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling on a matter we feel is urgent. The federal government wanted by so doing to indirectly salvage mega-projects that had been terminated over these last two weeks, for the sake of being able to say that in 1990, Canada could be self-sufficient in the area of energy resources.

Senator Robichaud: This implies an intention that was not necessarily valid.

Senator Asselin: Therefore, they go directly to the Supreme Court. They put aside the normal process that must be respected before the superior courts, especially when the reference to those provincial courts is already a matter of fact.

My view is that by acting this way, they are trying to de-stabilize the normal judicial process. This is the danger referred to earlier by my colleague and friend Senator Lang when he referred to the competence and objectivity of the Newfoundland Supreme Court being questioned, as well as its integrity, by short-circuiting that court and applying to the Supreme Court for a ruling on a question that was already before the Newfoundland Supreme Court.

Where is the danger in such a process? Where is the danger in having contradictory judgments? When one has been or still is pleading before the courts of justice, very often, if a point of law is raised, the Superior Court will tell lawyers: Well, we are going to adjourn that matter because the same matter is now before the Court of Appeal. Since we do not want to have contradictory judgments, we are going to wait for that court's decision. And rightly so, because contradictory judgments would tend to upset the continuity of jurisprudence before our courts. Could you visualize the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal in one province dealing with the same matter but handing down contradictory decisions? Honourable senators, the whole process of court rulings and our courts of law would be turned upside down.

How could we in all honesty implement conflicting rulings, add them to our precedents and invoke them in our courts of law? I say that is the danger the government is now running into. That danger must be pointed out in a debate such as this one this evening. There is danger in conflicting rulings.

We trust the Supreme Court in all its wisdom will wait for the decision of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal before complying with the request of the federal government. I am convinced that in its wisdom the Supreme Court will wait for that decision, and that is the wish I make this evening. As Senator Lang said, the federal government should not be perceived by the Canadian people as constantly using the Supreme Court as an instrument to settle its political differences with the provinces. Even though the Supreme Court has in the past rendered decisions more favourable to the federal government than provincial governments on constitutional issues, it does not mean that the federal government should be perceived by the Canadian people as appealing to the Supreme Court to anticipate favourable decisions on contentious constitutional issues. I think that we should dispel the impression Canadians taxpayers have that the Supreme Court is the instrument of the central government.

If contentious issues are constantly referred to the Supreme Court, we must ask ourselves what will become of federal-provincial conferences. What credibility will these conferences retain, especially in view of the federal government's tendency to seek judicial rather than political answers to differences. Could we then take the proceedings of federal-provincial conferences seriously? Why condemn some provinces for being reluctant to take part in these federal-provincial meetings when contentious issues as important as those currently being debated cannot be resolved politically?

Honourable senators, we would have been remiss as parliamentarians if we had failed during this debate to condemn the federal government for its arrogant, to say the least, attitude with respect to a decision of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal. In this connection, here is what the editor of Le Devoir, Jean-Louis Roy, wrote on May 21, 1982:

Ottawa's decision must be condemned. From a strictly political point of view, it will only result in a further deterioration of intergovernmental relations. It will needlessly turn against the federal government a people anxious to throw off the yoke of economic dependency and benefit from resources the proximity and abundance of which allowed them to finally hope for a level of development comparable to those of other Canadian regions.

In a more balanced federal system, a solution to this wealth-sharing problem would have been found through negotiation. But the great design of this Canadian government is to assert its hegemony, to grab further powers, to control all developments and to weaken all regions and provinces. This approach has resulted in an impoverishment of Canadian society. In this case, it is needless provocation. Nothing positive will come out of the humiliation and revolt of Newfoundlanders, except further obstacles to the development of a province that could foresee the end of its dependency.

At this point, honourable senators, I want to congratulate personally the Newfoundland senators who last week explained to the Senate the seriousness of the problem. I should like to single out Senator Doody who had the courage to rise and support the views of his province and of Newfoundlanders. I cannot help mention the courageous attitude of Senator Cook who has asked to sit as an independent in this chamber. I think that the residents of Newfoundland will be grateful to him for this gesture. I commend Senator Lang for raising this significant issue in the Senate. Those questions deserve to be debated in all seriousness and objectivity as he has done this evening. I hope that my contribution will shed some light on the problem.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Flynn: Will you speak tomorrow?

Senator Perrault: I may, yes. The spirit may move me.

Senator Flynn: It had better be the spirit.

Senator Roblin: What kind of spirit?

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Wednesday, May 26, 1982

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Twelfth Report as follows:

In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee recommends that Criterion 13 of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be amended as follows:

"is not in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or with the Canadian Bill of Rights."

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS—ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY BOARD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if the Senate permits, I will pose a couple of modest questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): How out of character!

Senator Roblin: I am a modest man. Some say I have much to be modest about.

Senator Frith: We never said that.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): We would not say that.

Senator Roblin: I would not expect that you would.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are not in a position to say that.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend give me some information with respect to the Canadian content in some of the mega-projects that are still in hand, or some of the projects that are going ahead at the present time?

I understand, and I should like him to confirm, that the Major Projects Assessment Agency comes under his jurisdiction. Is that so, and is Canada Benefits a shorthand way of describing the activities of that unit?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Major Projects Assessment Agency comes under the control of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the department that will be amalgamated with DREE, which will then become the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion, DRIE.

I am not quite sure that I understood the second part of my friend's question.

Senator Roblin: In some government propaganda reference has been made to an outfit called Canada Benefits. This is the title which has been given to it in much the same way as we refer to Canada Transport.

I am curious to know whether this is the same body that is otherwise referred to as the Major Projects Assessment Agency and, if not, what is it?

• (1405)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will give a precise answer to that question.

Senator Flynn: Why do you have to warn us? Is that something new?

Senator Olson: I wish to give exact, precise information. I am sure that is what Senator Roblin is asking for, so I will take the question as notice to the extent that there may be some difference in the terms of reference between the two agencies.

Quite obviously, however, there are two important functions to be performed. One is to ensure that Canadian companies have the information necessary as to the procurement policies—perhaps not so much policies as items—that will be coming up in the immediate, medium and long-term future. It is useful for Canadian companies to know about such things so that they can prepare themselves to bid and, hopefully, to provide the supplies in that respect.

I will, however, obtain a more precise answer if there is a difference in the terms of reference of the two bodies.

Senator Roblin: I would be glad to have the terms of reference. Perhaps the minister could also tell me how many people are working at this particular activity, and what their budget is. The relevance of my question can perhaps be seen more clearly when one takes note of the fact that another body has been set up which is called a mega-projects advisory board. The report is that that is being taken care of by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Honourable Herb Gray.

I would like to know the terms of reference of this body, how they relate to the government organization that has been set up, and why it has been thought necessary to establish an annual budget of $1 million, with nine full-time employees, for this apparently extracurricular activity.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will obtain a reply to that question as well, although the last body that my honourable friend mentioned is really an advisory council. Its formation was one of the major recommendations that came from the Major Capital Projects Task Force co-chaired by Blair and Carr. That council will perform a somewhat different function, in that it will be attempting to give advice—it could be referred to as a tripartite body composed of representatives of business, labour and government—not only in terms of the supplying of Canadian content, but also in terms of a good deal of the management and related matter that ought to have input from all three sectors with respect to the progress of these projects.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has put his finger on the point that interests me, because I am aware that this new body arose from the report of that task force.

I believe one of the other recommendations made by that body was that there should be some advantage given to procurement in Canada; in other words, if my memory serves me correctly, that other sources of supply would be subject to a 5 per cent preference in terms of Canadian sources.

Leaving aside altogether the merits of that particular program at the present time, it would be interesting to know whether it is included in the terms of reference. If it is, obviously we have more explaining to do to some of our friends on the rest of this continent and elsewhere. I would like to know the government's policy in respect of it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will seek a reply to that question as to whether it was in the terms of reference. Off the top of my head, I do not believe it was, although there were one or two other fairly important recommendations involved in the response to the report of the Major Capital Projects Task Force. One has to do with labour union fees and that sort of thing. There were several other major recommendations included in the report, but I do not believe the terms of reference, if you like, contained all of those recommendations.

I have to say to my honourable friend as well that after the advisory committee is set up it will, no doubt, be making recommendations from time to time. Therefore, I would suggest that, while the terms of reference may not be completely fleshed out at this point in time, the committee would be considered competent to make recommendations on a fairly wide range of issues involving these mega-projects.

Senator Roblin: I am sure the terms of reference could include the power to make recommendations without causing any problems, but I regard that as being a standard procedure with respect to any advisory board. Indeed, if they cannot make recommendations, what are they there for? I want to know why we apparently have a two-pronged attack on this thing. One does wonder what results we are going to get.

I ask my honourable friend, in connection with the Beaufort agreement that was announced the other day, whether or not the present body, which is called the Major Projects Assessment Agency or Canada Benefits, had any input into procurement with respect to the Beaufort and, if so, what the result has been.

Senator Olson: I can try to get that information, and I suppose it is something that cannot be measured as precisely as we may want to because, no doubt, they have attempted to give some information to Canadian suppliers. I suppose it is a matter of judgment as to how effective it has been, but we have had some other experience in this. For example, with respect to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline, there were some undertakings given by the company at the outset when we went through the hearings preparatory to passing the bill in 1977. The sections that have been built to date have gone in a way that the Canadian content has been somewhat over 90 per cent. I am sure that that was done primarily because there was advance information as to what was required given to Canadian suppliers so they could arrange their bidding and fabrication or manufacturing processes.

Senator Roblin: I hope it is effective, because I think the goals are shared by many of us here. I have to report to the minister that with respect to the Beaufort, the public statements made by those involved indicated that there was really no change between what their procurement situation was before they entered the Beaufort and what it was after. If that report is correct, it would appear that the government has not been successful in persuading those people to make many changes.

Senator Olson: I suppose it could be interpreted one other way, which is that the government was highly successful in getting the message across to those companies that it was desirable from our point of view to maximize the Canadian content.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is entitled to take that interpretation, but I would really like him to show it.

INDUSTRY

DOME PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a brief question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On May 20, in response to a question from Senator Flynn concerning the Dome Petroleum problem, the minister said:

There has been no response to any request with respect to their financing problems by the federal government.

Can the minister confirm that the government has received from Dome Petroleum Ltd. a certain request concerning their financial problem?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I cannot confirm that absolutely in the terms that my honourable friend would like, because I do not believe that I can say that there has been no discussion with any government official by any official of Dome Petroleum. To my knowledge, there has not been a formal request made with respect to financial assistance. It is one of those areas where, I suppose, you could find some official, at whatever level, who talked to some other official at another level in Dome Petroleum, who then spoke to an official of the Canadian government, and you could surmise from that that there had been a request. There has been no request known to me.

Senator Nurgitz: I take it from the minister's response that there has been no informal request either.

Senator Olson: Not to my knowledge.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

COMMON STOCK OWNERSHIP—SUGGESTED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL INCENTIVE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The budget brought in recently by the Provincial Treasurer in Ontario recommended substantial income tax incentives for people to buy common stocks. The Treasurer of Ontario indicated that Ontario is prepared to work with Ottawa in designing an effective mechanism, and to bear its share of the costs. Is the federal government prepared to enter into a program with the Government of Ontario, and perhaps with other provincial governments, to promote common stock ownership?

• (1415)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not questioning the accuracy of the statements attributed to ministers or officials of the Province of Ontario, but I would like to say that if that is their view, they have no doubt already communicated it to the Minister of Finance. I will make inquiries to find out whether such an initiative has been taken.

Senator Murray: Well, my question really is whether the government is considering any such incentives to stock ownership. I would have thought that the Minister of State for Economic Development would have been concerned about the fact that the depressed markets and continued high interest rates make it almost impossible for businesses to raise capital at affordable prices. Therefore, I will ask the minister a general policy question.

Does this government, like its predecessor, the Conservative government, consider that promoting stock ownership is a priority, and does it acknowledge any responsibility, either in co-operation with the provinces or alone, to bring forward policies appropriate to that end?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, a number of businessmen, and, indeed, a number of people in the government, have indicated that a higher equity-to-debt ratio would be highly desirable. There is no question about that. In trying to reply to my honourable friend's question, however, in which he is asking whether this is under consideration, I have already said that I would ask the Minister of Finance whether they have received that initiative, and what their response to it, if any, is, or if they are looking at such a proposal.

I think my honourable friend did say, in quoting the statement that he attributed to someone, that they were trying to get together to design a policy that might be effective in that respect.

With regard to his other question, I know that members of the opposition do not like it when I answer this way, but it is a fact of life, and I have to say again that I cannot and will not discuss here, or with the press or anyone else, those matters that are on the agenda at cabinet meetings.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this matter on the agenda?

Senator Olson: I am not free to do that.

Senator Flynn: But is it on the agenda?

THE ECONOMY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MAINTENANCE SHOPS LAYOFFS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The Canadian National Railways has extended its layoffs for an additional six- to eight-week period, putting approximately 3,200 people temporarily out of work. Does the minister have any assurance for those laid off that the Canadian National shops will definitely reopen, with the complete resumption of operations, at the end of the eight-week period?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give that definite assurance. I believe that it is not only the Canadian National Railways that is doing this; Canadian Pacific have also indicated that there has been a reduction in the total tonnage that they are hauling, and that therefore the requirement for maintenance and repair has gone down somewhat. What they have done is to extend the period in some of the shops somewhat longer than they normally do, and it is our hope, which I am sure my honourable friend shares, that there will be an upturn in the economy, and in the activity contributed to the economy by the railways, that will require the services of all of those people again very shortly.

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I certainly share the minister's hope that there will be an upturn in the economy, because Canadian National has found it necessary, because of the bleak economic outlook, to announce that an additional 2,500 employees will be laid off this year. At the same time, a subsidiary of Canadian National, the Grand Trunk Corporation of Detroit, a wholly owned holding company, has provided a letter of intent to acquire the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company. Will any of the 2,500 employees who are to be laid off by Canadian National this year receive employment on the railway that Canadian National is purchasing in the United States, and that has been closed because of bankruptcy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could ask that question and try to get my honourable friend a reply, but I think he answered his own question when he said something to the effect that the railway that was under consideration for acquisition was not operating at full capacity either. Therefore, I expect it would not be a high hope that a number of those people could be transferred to work on that railway. It may not suit their situation, in any event, because in a number of places, such as Moncton, Calgary and Winnipeg, where there are extended down periods for the maintenance shops, the people living there may wish—and I believe they would—to stay in those communities to resume their activities rather than move elsewhere.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary for the minister. Will the $250 million bankrupt acquisition be known as the Horner's spur?

Senator Olson: No, I do not think it will.

CALCULATION OF ANNUAL INFLATION RATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Frequently, comparisons are made of the inflation rate which exists in Canada and the United States. Some people contend that the United States has been more effective in controlling inflation than has Canada. It is my understanding that the Americans have a different way of computing their inflation rate. I understand that they annualize the monthly rate. For instance, if the rate of inflation for a particular month is one per cent, they multiply that rate by 12, which would equal an annual inflation rate of 12 per cent, whereas in Canada we take the total of the inflation rate for the last 12 months and average out the total. I understand that the inflation rate is now approximately 11.3 or 11.5 per cent.

Has the minister or the government given any thought to adopting the American way of calculating the inflation rate? In April the inflation rate was half of one per cent. That means that the projection, if we follow the American system, would be 6 per cent per year. Such news would restore confidence in our economy, and it would have a beneficial impact on those who are negotiating wage contracts and projecting prices.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not wish to give a full explanation of the method by which the inflation rate is calculated in Canada vis-à-vis the United States. I am not sure that I know all of the details. However, I do believe that in Canada there are two inflation rates given: one is the annual rate—that is, measuring March against March; and the other reflects any change from one month to the next. Prominence is given, in most cases, to the year-by-year rate. I am not sure that they do that in the United States, although I do know that recently there have been some indications that the inflation rate has gone down, in the last four months or so, to below 3 per cent and, indeed, down to zero. Yet the annual calculation in the United States, from one year to the next, is somewhere between 6 and 7 per cent. So there may be a difference. It may be a matter of semantics—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And you would settle for that?

Senator Olson:—as to which rate is given the most prominence. Certainly, in Canada inflation has receded somewhat over the past four or five months, but it has not receded as much as in the United States, whether one measures it year by year or from one month to the succeeding month. I will try to obtain a more detailed explanation as to whether there are significant differences in the way the two countries calculate the inflation rate.

Senator Flynn: Has the minister any objection to Senator Bosa's using his own method for political benefit?

Senator Olson: I do not have any objection to that, any more than I have to the opposition using different figures at different times for its own political benefit.

● (1425)

Senator Flynn: We used your figures.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You don't give up, do you, Bud?

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS—ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY BOARD

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can the minister confirm whether the government is setting up a mega-projects advisory board to secure industrial benefits for Canadians from projects valued at more than $100 million?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I can. I answered a similar question for Senator Roblin a few moments ago. The honourable senator will find a more detailed answer to his question in the response to Senator Roblin's questions which I will bring to the house as soon as I can.

Senator Donahoe: I thought that I had understood from Senator Roblin's questions that the answer to my question was "yes," but I wanted to be sure that it was in fact "yes".

If the minister is aware that such a board is being set up, is he also aware of the existence of the Office of Regional and Industrial Benefits in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and, if so, would he be good enough to elaborate on its mandate?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall bring to the Senate a more detailed reply, including a description of the functions and terms of reference of that department, along with my response to Senator Roblin's questions.

Senator Donahoe: I have a further supplementary question. In October 1981, the Office of Regional and Industrial Benefits presented an inventory of major capital projects. Those, I think, are the projects to which my honourable friend was referring. Each of the projects had a value of more than $100 million. Inasmuch as the Office of Regional and Industrial Benefits ostensibly seeks to maximize the benefits which Canadians derive from economic development projects, and considering that that body has already given much attention to the so-called mega-projects, would the minister be good enough to tell the Senate why the government needs that new bureaucratic agency?

Senator Olson: I tried to explain that a few minutes ago by saying that the function of a number of these offices, committees or advisory councils is to attempt to maximize the Canadian economic benefits from major projects. In any event, I am repeating what I said before, and I also repeat that when I get a more detailed answer to a number of questions asked by Senator Roblin, there will be—and I am certain Senator Donahoe will agree—a complete answer contained in that reply to the questions he has just raised.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the honourable minister for his answers, and I suggest to him that a complete answer is really very desirable, because to explain to the members of this chamber why two organizations are required to do the same job really requires some explaining.

Senator Olson: I am sure that a very satisfactory explanation will be forthcoming.

Senator Donahoe: I hope so.

GRAIN

CONFERENCE OF WHEAT EXPORTING COUNTRIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to ask a question of my honourable friend, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but, first, I want to tell him that I am glad to see him here; I have missed him. I was hoping to deal with some of these topics sooner, but the minister has been elusive, no doubt for good reason.

The minister will recall that late last month there was a gathering in Ottawa of officials from the five wheat-exporting countries and groups—Australia, the United States, the European Economic Community, Argentina and Canada—to discuss, according to a quotation ascribed to him, "ways and means of continuing an international consultation process with respect to wheat." When the conference reported to the general public, the information that percolated out was really not very encouraging regarding such international co-operation. In fact, each country or group seemed to have a special problem it was grumbling about. Can my honourable friend give me any information as to what the reactions of the Government of Canada are to this particular meeting?

• (1430)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, it was a meeting of officials and, of course, in that context ministers were not in attendance.

The report I was given by officials in the Grains Group indicated that they felt it was a very useful meeting. They canvassed the general world situation and world stocks. They discussed some of the problems affecting world trade at the present time, including the EEC policy with regard to exports.

The press reports of that meeting were, generally, quite negative and, as a result of reading those reports, the general interpretation could be that the meeting was not productive and may even be considered a failure.

The Canadian officials who attended felt that it was a very useful meeting and, as a matter of fact, they recommend that a second meeting be held at a later date, again at the officials level.

I think the meeting was useful and certainly provided an exchange of information. Those who are involved in the grain business in Canada, especially the Canadian Wheat Board and the people I deal with, feel that these kinds of meetings, providing an exchange of views, are very useful and that it is necessary to continue the dialogue among the various exporting countries; and this process is going on.

Senator Roblin: I am sure my honourable friend uses the term "useful" in its full diplomatic sense, rather than in any real sense that the rest of us poor mortals could understand.

Is it not correct that as a result of this meeting we learn that the European Economic Community's representations were to the effect that they had no intention of changing their common market agriculture prices which are so objectionable to us; that the Australians complained that the Americans were using political influence in the sale of wheat in the eastern hemisphere; and that the United States itself was threatening to institute export subsidies if others did not come into line? I am glad to be able to report to the minister that it appears the Canadian grumbling was limited to less important spheres.

What was accomplished? Was this just an opportunity for everyone to re-state their particular interests in the world wheat situation? What is proposed to be accomplished by the next meeting of the officials?

Senator Argue: This was a meeting of officials; it was not a meeting of ministers. No doubt, some of the grievances to which Senator Roblin has referred were, in fact, discussed, but the information I have is that it was an amicable, positive meeting and, therefore, that kind of interpretation of the conduct of the meeting is not warranted.

I do not have the joint press release that was issued by all of those who attended the meeting, but I can certainly provide that to Senator Roblin should he be interested.

Senator Roblin: I am not blaming the minister for this, but it is cold comfort for some of our producers in the west.

I understand, however, if my information is correct, that there has been, or is going to be, a ministerial meeting between my honourable friend and the United States Secretary of Agriculture. Has that taken place?

Senator Argue: Yes.

Senator Roblin: Was the question of American export subsidy policy raised by anybody at that meeting, and is any change in American sales policy, in fact, being considered by the Americans?

Senator Argue: I had the privilege today of meeting with Secretary of Agriculture Block in Ottawa. The general grain situation was discussed. The whole question of exporter co-operation was discussed in general terms.

The American policy, as I am sure Senator Roblin is aware, is to provide for loan rates at a certain figure, which, I believe, is $3.55 a bushel for the current year. For target prices it is something in excess of $4 a bushel in American funds for those who voluntarily come in and reduce acreage by 15 per cent. This is a factor that, generally, is underpinning the world market to some extent. I think everyone in the grain business agrees that those kinds of policies, in a sense, provide a floor.

It is fair to say that the Americans, including Secretary of Agriculture Block, have a good understanding of Canadian policies in the grain business, and of the Canadian Wheat Board policies, particularly as they relate to the export field. They feel that they have made a contribution to world stability or to an underwriting or underpinning of world prices by the measures to which I have already referred, and by their endeavour to achieve a cutback in American acreages.

We have pointed out to them, as I have pointed out to Secretary of Agriculture Block, that our systems are different, and that over the years we have been steadily losing our percentage of the world export market. As a matter of fact, our share of the world market has come down in a period of 10 years from 35 per cent to some 17 or 18 per cent.

Our objective is to achieve the maximum production of which our farmers are capable; to have in place a transportation system that is efficient and that will take this grain to market; and to endeavour to hold—it may not sound like a very ambitious objective—our present share of the international market.

Our analyses and projections indicate that over the years the export trade in grain will likely grow, and that if we can hold our current percentage we will be able to share in that general expansion of world grain exports.

Secretary of Agriculture Block is holding a news conference at the present time, and he will certainly be outlining the American point of view. However, I heard nothing during the course of our meeting that would suggest their entering into any element of subsidization in the export of American grains. That particular reference was not made at this meeting.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his very reassuring statement, because I know that he would be as alarmed as I if the American government were to announce a program of subsidies for exports over and above the measures that they have in place now and which, I agree with the minister, do affect the market to some extent.

I also take it from what he said that no suggestion was made by Secretary of Agriculture Block with respect to Canadian acreage controls. Certain set-asides and policies have been introduced in the United States, and I would like to be assured that we were not asked to consider any of them in Canada.

My final question on the same topic is whether the question of grain embargoes in the future came up for discussion with respect to policy stances that might be taken by either the United States or Canada.

Senator Argue: There was certainly no request made by the American authorities—that is, by Secretary of Agriculture Block or anyone else with him—that would suggest Canada should embark upon some kind of acreage reduction program or acreage controls.

I pointed out, and certainly the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board pointed out, that our system is very much different from the American system. Our system has evolved over a period of almost 50 years, with various federal governments in power, into the system we now have.

We are forecasting, and it is common knowledge, some very modest increase in carryover in Canada. Regarding the carryover in Canada, however, from the standpoint of a grain producer, acreage controls are something that, in my judgment, should not arise. Certainly there is no need to have them arise, and they did not arise, because there is full control of our system, as every grain producer is aware. We have quotas, we have a transportation system that is operating to capacity, we have certain contracts and we have certain sales opportunities. The constraint upon the individual farmer is that, after he or she has been able to sell all that is available from a particular farm unit, any carryover is a burden and becomes the responsibility of the individual farmer.

I simply want to make it completely clear that there was no discussion of any acreage controls or cutbacks, or any perception that there should be cutbacks in Canadian acreage.

Senator Roblin: What about embargoes?

Senator Argue: That subject did not arise, in the sense that we were not rehashing the embargoes of the past, or action that has been taken regarding embargoes for the future.

In the general context of what was said, I think it would be correct to assume that those attending the meeting were not considering the question of past embargoes or of any possible current embargoes. I believe that the philosophy at that discussion was that food is for people, and sales are necessary to move that food to the people who need it. With the exception of particular American policies—and the Honourable Senator Roblin is as aware of those policies as I am, and perhaps even more so—there was no disposition in the discussion to suggest that this was the way to go. The discussion concerned sales opportunities and market availability, not closing off particular markets.

Senator Roblin: Now that he has disclosed most of the important negative possibilities that were on the table, what can the minister say were the productive measures that we can expect, as a result of this meeting, that will increase the market and perhaps even the price for Canadian wheat producers?

Senator Argue: I think it is important to the grain business in Canada, and, I would think, in the United States, to hold this kind of discussion, both at the policy level and at the ministerial level. As the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Block, said, we need to keep our avenues of communication open. He said that we need to exchange views from time to time, and he was quite happy at the prospect of a further meeting of officials. As a matter of fact, there was an exchange about the possibility—perhaps even the probability—of a meeting at the ministerial level to discuss further aspects of the grain situation in terms of whatever might be the facts at that time.

I am not able to say to Senator Roblin, simply because the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Block, and I had a meeting with others on the question of grain policy, that a result is likely to flow quickly which will buoy the international market. It seems to me, however, that this meeting was constructive. It is important to have an exchange of views, to be prepared to keep in touch, one with the other, and to explore, from time to time, the possibility of development of co-operation between our two countries and among all the exporting countries in order to bring about what I think is necessary—some increase in international prices for grain.

ENERGY

EAST COAST—OFFSHORE OIL EXPLORATION

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question which I would like to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development. On April 27 I asked a question in this house concerning the allocation of drilling permits on the east coast. On Thursday last, the minister was kind enough to give me a delayed answer to that question, to which I listened with great interest.

Among other things, however, he said that the process of completing these agreements is proceeding expeditiously and is not holding up exploration programs. Honourable senators, I was intrigued by that comment and found it a little difficult to understand.

I should like to know whether the minister is aware that both BP and Shell, in March and April respectively, indicated that their drilling programs were being delayed by at least four months as a result of the delays in the awarding of drilling permits. If the minister is aware of those statements, how does he reconcile them with his delayed answer?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice. I am not sure whether the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is aware of the assertions made by the two companies mentioned, but I will make sure that they are made aware of them now. Perhaps the honourable senator could even more specifically identify the dates on which the statements were made so that we can find them in the press or communicate with the companies. I will bring the honourable senator a supplementary answer to the delayed answer that was given.

TRANSPORT

MANITOBA—CHURCHILL—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I believe my question is an important one and I do not want a delay because, in four to six weeks' time, the Port of Churchill will be opening.

According to a newspaper article that I read the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board made the statement that the Port of Churchill was not economical in the complete sense of the word—and I must say that I did not appreciate those comments—and went on, in the same article, to say that he tried to encourage the provincial governments in the west to use the Port of Churchill as much as they could. I noted that, in the same article, mention was made of the problem with regard to using hopper cars to bring the wheat to Churchill because of their excessive weight. At the same time, I understand that the regular freight cars are quite capable of transporting wheat to that port.

I should like to ask the minister whether any consideration can be given now to the possibility of increasing wheat shipments through the Port of Churchill so that the farmers in western Canada would benefit and not have to depend upon the provincial governments in this respect. Is there any reason why regular freight cars cannot be used for such shipments? They are more numerous and it seems to me that the most sensible solution is to use them, rather than attempt to effect some alteration to the tracks in order to use the bigger hopper cars. I believe regular freight cars have been used in the past. I wonder whether I might ask the minister for some type of response so that, in turn, I can pass it on to the people concerned, particularly those residents of my province who are concerned about the statement that was made.

I understand that an alderman from Moose Jaw made some comments in this particular instance which, in effect, are in agreement with the point that I am making at the moment.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board is programming grain to go through the Port of Churchill this year. I think I can say that it is hoped that this year will be an average one for Churchill. I suppose it is too early to say whether it will be one of its best years, but I do not think it will be one of its worst.

It is not feasible to use hopper cars—certainly not if they are loaded to capacity—on the Churchill line. Not only is it difficult to transport them because they carry 3,000 bushels of wheat as opposed to the 2,000 bushels that are carried in an ordinary box car, but apparently, when bringing back the empty cars, at a speed of 15 or 20 miles an hour, a rhythm seems to develop with the hopper cars to the point where they jump the tracks. The problem, therefore, arises in bringing them back empty rather than in transporting them full. I realize that that does not make too much sense, but the authorities tell me that is the way it is.

Perhaps Senator Roblin could take a trip there some time to see whether this musical vibration effect does indeed get going in the 3,000-bushel hopper cars, with the result that they all jump the track. In any event, as Senator Guay is aware, standard box cars are used. The constriction has nothing to do with the quantity of box cars that are around, nor do I think there is particular difficulty regarding supplies within the Churchill area for this year. It is a question of customers wishing to use the Port of Churchill. From a Canadian Wheat Board standpoint, or from a producers' standpoint, the Port of Churchill is uneconomic if the quantities handled through it are much less than half a million tonnes. If they are half a million tonnes or more, then at some point, at least on the basis of past history, Churchill makes a net return and has a better costing than Thunder Bay. If the quantities that can be put through Churchill are very small, then, of course, the honourable senator appreciates that the cost per bushel goes up accordingly and it is not, in a sense, a money-making proposition from the standpoint of western wheat producers.

Churchill is used mainly by two importing countries—Poland and the Soviet Union. Poland is in the process of buying substantial quantities of grain; the Soviet Union is our largest customer.

When I have further details, I shall report them to the Senate, but in general terms all I can say is that the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned about the use of Churchill, and to the extent that our customers are willing to come in and use the Port of Churchill, it will add to its viability.

To date, provincial governments have failed to make use of Churchill for potash, coal and other commodities. All one can do is encourage provincial governments to use the Port of Churchill. Perhaps with some change in governments, there may be better days ahead for Churchill.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, the minister made reference to potash and coal. Is the weight, with regard to the track and permafrost, once again not his concern? I ask the minister to make every possible effort to give us substantially more delivery through Churchill than we had last year. With such a low percentage as 2 per cent, it is understandable why it is not economic.

Senator Argue: I do not think I can add anything to the figures I have given. Half a million tonnes, in a sense, is the economic level for the use of Churchill. If it is used in the normal way and can get up to something like 500,000 tonnes, then it is a very good operation. If it has to be substantially lower, then it is not an economic operation. There are those who have said that we should use Churchill, despite foul weather conditions and the lack of customers, to ship 3 per cent of our grain through Churchill. That may be all right for somebody to set as a target, but it is not very practical unless you can match it with the customers who actually want to use Churchill. The Canadian Wheat Board is supportive of Churchill, and I am certainly supportive of Churchill. I hope it will be a good season.

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for second reading of Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, yesterday evening when Senator Neiman ended her comments on the bill now before the house, I had an opportunity to congratulate her on her very thorough and accurate exposé on this extremely important and lengthy piece of legislation. I said then that I would read over her presentation, and now that I have done so, I can only reiterate my congratulations to Senator Neiman.

The bill now before the Senate is not one that is highly controversial. If we look at the proceedings in the other place and the committee proceedings, we find that all political parties and, in fact, all members were agreed on the general objectives contained in this bill. They were all in agreement with the objectives stated by the Solicitor General when he introduced the bill, namely, that the bill was intended to strike a reasonable and acceptable balance between the needs of young offenders and the interests of society. I believe that is, in fact, the very basis of the legislation we are discussing here today.

As was said in the other place, the bill responds to a need. The present law, which, it seems, has been on the books for nearly seventy-three years, has become obsolete and is almost impossible to implement, in view of the tremendous changes that have taken place in the last ten years with respect to methodology, education and supervision of young offenders. Fifty years ago, there were no courses in criminology. There were no courses in special education and child guidance. People could not understand why one would hire psychiatrists and psychologists. However, I think the latter have made a distinct contribution and have made it possible for the legislators to examine a piece of legislation such as the bill we have before us today.

In fact, the state is the guardian of defenseless citizens and especially of children who are not considered responsible for their actions. My colleagues of the Quebec Bar are well aware that our Civil Code states that minors are considered "incapable", in the same way as the persons interdicted under the provisions of the law.

I therefore believe that it is first up to the parents, but also up to the state, in a supplementary role, to intervene when these young people need the state to solve certain problems that they can not solve themselves. However, and I wish to emphasize this, this legislation could not exist without the participation of the provinces which are responsible for its administration, while the federal government sees to its enforcement as it relates to the Criminal Code.

In reading the proceedings of the committee of the other place, I was very much surprised to see some of the statistics given during the hearings which showed that the judiciary had dealt with nearly 91,000 cases of juvenile delinquency in 1978. In 1980, 73,000 infractions were committed, which involved 28,000 children who came under the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Those who have practised criminal law, as I have myself for many years, and who know that 80 per cent of adult criminals have been in conflict with the law since their childhood, are better able to realize the urgent need for the state to make available to our young people a court system which can better understand their emotional needs. What could better help them in making sometimes difficult decisions when they have to determine the responsibility for their actions before a youth court than this act on young offenders?

Last evening, Senator Neiman noted that the major points included in this legislation had already been the subject of an agreement by the provincial attorneys general. The Solicitor General said the same thing in the other place. He listed a series of points of agreement between the provinces and the federal government. The consensus for abolishing delinquency, as such, as a general offence, was mentioned. There had also been agreement about the maximum age, which now varies according to the province. The suggested age was under 18 years. I shall come back to this aspect later on because the fact that the age varies too much from one province to another is one of our basic objections to this bill. This party raised that objection in committee and raised it again in the other place where an amendment was put forward to that effect. I shall return to this later on, to put in context our major concerns, for the purpose not of criticizing the bill but of improving the legislation now before us.

We also agreed to alternative measures at the discretion of the provinces. We reached an agreement on the dangers inherent in the "dejudicialization" program in this bill. Looking at the bill, we find it was drawn up with compassion in mind; it will encourage the young to confide to a larger extent in the authorities responsible for implementing the act. Indeed, it is no longer called the Juvenile Delinquents Act, because for the legal mind the term "delinquents" has a criminal connotation. The name has been changed, and the act will be called the "Young Offenders Act". With this new wording, Parliament shows its compassion for the young.

There have been other agreements on specific items, namely on the authority of the provincial director, the detailed examination procedure, provisions to regulate the establishment, maintenance and confidentiality, the consulting of youth courts' records and the destruction of personal records. Those are innovations which are not in the present act. Often times, when we talk of destroying personal records, the young delinquent under the existing act carries that millstone around his neck for four or five years before he can be rehabilitated through a pardon by the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General.

There has also been agreement on the basic rights of our youth: the right to be heard, the right to take part in proceedings, to be informed of charges, to be represented by counsel. There has also been agreement on the total discretion of the authorities in dealing with young people. Previously, sentences were arbitrary and regressive. Today, we have embarked upon a new approach to youth sentences. For example, when referring to decriminalizing the act now before us, the offender may be sentenced to make restitution to the victim of his theft. He may be ordered to repay the money by instalments over a certain period. In this way, we are forcing the young offender to assume responsibility for his act. He may also be fined. The young offender will be made aware of the responsibility he should have toward society. He may be sentenced to undertake community service.

Those are positive aspects of the act. Previously, we used to get rid of the young offender by sending them to prison for so many days or weeks. Also, when giving prison terms, care was not taken to separate the young from the adults. They therefore came into contact with hardened criminals and in this way he learned to relapse into crime. These are points which were raised by the Solicitor General and agreed upon by the provincial attorneys general during the discussions concerning the Young Offenders Bill.

To our mind, Criminal Code enforcement should be consistent all across Canada. People must be equal before the law. That is why I should like to deal now with the standardizing of the maximum age for people to be considered as young offenders. The federal government had suggested age 16. The law says that it is 18 in Quebec, 18 in Manitoba, 17 in British Columbia, 16½ in Newfoundland, and 16 in the remaining provinces and the Northwest Territories. I am under the impression that there was a lack of consultation with the provinces concerning the possible standardizing of the maximum age throughout Canada. This way, a young person in British Columbia would not be more penalized because of his or her age than a young person in Quebec if he or she were taken to court. Some may reply that there may be standardization come third reading, once the minister has decided that the maximum age will be 18 everywhere.

There are provinces which do not accept this. I will mention Nova Scotia whose Minister of Social Services wrote a letter to my colleague Senator Macdonald to make representations on a number of major objections he has to the bill which is now before us. I will take the opportunity to read to you excerpts from this letter as evidence that all the provinces do not agree on certain provisions of this bill. Honourable senators might be well advised to invite these witnesses to come and present their views.

[English]

I have just said that our party has certain objections to the bill.

First, while there should be a uniform maximum age for young offenders across Canada, our party feels that the maximum should be 16 years.

Secondly, there has been inadequate work done by the government concerning the cost of implementing the provisions of this bill and the implications these new costs will have for the provinces, which will be responsible for administering the provisions contained in the bill. There has to date been only the weakest commitment from the federal government concerning funding for the provinces respecting young offenders.

In committee, the Solicitor General made known the government's intention of having a uniform maximum age of under 18 years. This was a retreat from its position on second reading, as I said earlier. At that point in time the government proposed to allow for a variable maximum age determined by the province or territory in question. Our party very strongly opposed this government stance and moved to deny second reading on the basis of it.

• (1510)

[Translation]

I would remind you that on second reading my colleague in the other place, the Honourable Allan Lawrence, moved the following amendment:

This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-61, an Act respecting young offenders, because the bill rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the Act will apply to different age groups in different provinces.

[English]

At the committee stage, we commended the government for seeing the light on the question of age, but we stated that it had chosen the wrong maximum. As honourable senators know, Quebec and Manitoba currently have a maximum age of 18 years; Newfoundland and British Columbia have a maximum of 17 years; and the other provinces and territories have a maximum of 16 years. We argued for 16 years on philosophical and cost grounds.

On the question of funding, we questioned the government very closely on the costing they had done, and their commitment to help share costs with the provinces in this area of the law. Presently funding is carried on by the federal government through the Canada Assistance Plan. The government had almost no idea what the costs of the new act would be and had not costed out various alternative provisions in the act. Further, the Solicitor General would only state that the government would continue its present funding level for delinquents, or young offenders as they will now be called, and may increase it. Many provinces, in putting their case to the committee, made it clear that their new costs, by reason of the new provisions of the bill and the maximum age of 18 years, would be very high. As an example, British Columbia will have an estimated increase in costs of $43 million. The bill's only provision dealing with funding is clause 69 which allows the minister to enter into agreements with the provinces respecting funding.

Our party moved several amendments at the committee stage. In preparing my speech I learned that 70 amendments had been adopted. Those amendments had been put forward in the committee by all parties. Several amendments were accepted and served to improve the bill. While many of those amendments were minor in nature, our amendment to clause 24, dealing with custody, was very substantial. Specifically, as honourable senators will see in the present clause 24(3), we moved to include conditions for the use of secure custody, in order to give some degree of certainty as to when secure and open custody will be used.

Those are our main objections to the bill. It is our hope that we will find a way of overcoming our objections by having witnesses appear before the committee to explain their case.

As I said a few moments ago, my colleague, Senator Smith, may also have received representations from the Nova Scotia minister, and, no doubt, he will wish to deal with them. If he wishes, I will let him proceed. I believe it will be proper for the committee to call upon the Minister of Social Services of Nova Scotia to hear his views on the clauses of the bill. Senator Smith may wish to say a few words on this matter, and I would like him to have the floor now.

[Translation]

We could, of course, discuss at length the various provisions of this bill. It has been thoroughly considered at various stages in the other place as well as in committee.

We in the opposition will not object if the bill is referred to the appropriate Senate committee for further study; however, we reserve the right to raise our objections in committee as well as on third reading.

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as my colleague, Senator Asselin, has said, I have received a number of representations on behalf of the Province of Nova Scotia, and I thank him for allowing me to deal with that particular subject.

First, I should like to join him in congratulating the senator who sponsored the bill. Certainly it was done with care, in detail and with clarity. I should also like to congratulate Senator Asselin for his presentation on behalf of the party to which I belong.

I do not rise in any way to oppose the general principle of the bill, but only to present some aspects of the views of the Province of Nova Scotia which both the province and I believe will improve the bill from the point of view of its effectiveness with respect to young people and the administration of the act itself.

One effect of the bill, when compared to the present Juvenile Delinquents Act, will be to remove the responsibility of parents in the sense of being liable to certain sanctions if they are found to be in any way guilty of contributing to the delinquency of the child. It would appear to the Province of Nova Scotia, and to me, that that is not necessarily a good thing. In that respect, I might point out that the victim of an act constituting an offence committed by a young offender will not, so far as we can tell from the present state of the law, be able to recover damages under any law having to do with compensation for victims of crime—because, after all, the young offender is most unlikely to be able to respond to any order made in that respect, and if the parent is also absolved from any liability, then it would seem clear that the victim, if he suffered any damage for which compensation could be helpful, would be unlikely to be able to obtain it except in cases where the young offender was able to respond to some order of that kind. It does not seem to me, or to the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia, that that is necessarily a good thing, from the point of view of society as a whole. It is also not a good thing from the point of view of bringing home to the young offender and his family the fact that there is a certain amount of accountability and responsibility, and that other people do suffer from an improper act committed by the young offender.

This bill also raises the age of responsibility from the age of seven to the age of twelve. Though this may well be seen, and may well be advanced in certain respects of social justice, as an improvement in social rights, it does have the effect of making it possible for young persons between the ages of seven and twelve to become the victims of improper urging or enticement on behalf of older people, who will be able to point out to them that they are not responsible for the acts they commit. This proposition does not necessarily seem to be a very valuable contribution to the good of society as a whole or, indeed, to the children.

On the matter of age, my colleague has referred to that at some length. The Government of Nova Scotia feels that the age of 16 is the best of a number of alternative ages as the maximum age of young people to whom this kind of statute should apply. They point out, among other things, that there is a very pragmatic effect of raising the age to 18, and that is in the field of costs. The more people who are made subject to the provisions of this kind of legislation, then the more likely it is that the costs thereof will be increased, although, of course, when one compares the costs under this legislation to dealing with a person 17 or 18 years of age under the Criminal Code, it is not always possible to say just where the advantage in cost lies. Certainly, that is a practical consideration.

On the matter of age also, the Government of Nova Scotia feels—and, again, I agree with their view—that the way the legislation appears to read, it would be possible to place young offenders from the ages of 12 to 17 with older offenders who, as I think my colleague, Senator Asselin, said, are often people who have a substantial history of crime and are not necessarily likely to be very helpful companions for the younger people with whom they have to serve their sentence. So the Government of Nova Scotia states that while it is very difficult to be exact in estimating on a forward basis the increase in costs this legislation will likely bring with it to that province, if the maximum age remains at age 16, the estimated extra cost will be about $4 million, and if the maximum age stays at 18, as it is now in the bill, it will likely be in the vicinity of $9.75 million or $10 million. While costs are not necessarily the most decisive factor in dealing with social problems, they are not items that can be readily ignored. They have to be taken into account as one of the factors in determining whether or not a certain proposed provision is likely to be practical and within the means of those who have to enforce it and pay for it.

My colleague, Senator Asselin, has pointed out clause 70, on page 74 of the bill, which recognizes the importance of costs. Perhaps, I could just read it.

70. Any Minister of the Crown may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into an agreement with the government of any province providing for payments by Canada to the province in respect of costs incurred by the province for care of and services provided to young persons dealt with under this Act.

As I understand the present situation, the provinces, or at least the province on behalf of which I speak, has no real knowledge of what the terms of any such agreement will be, whether they will be somewhat in the nature of the provisions of the Canada Assistance Act or whether they will be on some other basis entirely. As a result, the provinces are actually reluctant to become bound by legislation which will certainly involve substantial costs, without having a pretty good idea as to how those costs will be shared between the two levels of government.

There are some other matters which concern my province, but I think those are the main ones. I join with Senator Asselin in expressing the hope that the committee to which this bill is referred will invite representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia to appear before it and to produce in somewhat more detail, and with somewhat more factual support than I have been able to do, the problems they envisage.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Would the honourable senator permit a question for clarification?

Senator Smith: Surely.

Senator Godfrey: Is the proposal by Nova Scotia that the maximum age be 16, or under 16?

Senator Smith: That it be 16.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the bill.

First, I entirely support Senator Smith's request that the committee invite representatives from the Province of Nova Scotia, but I would go considerably further in my invitations. I have maintained for some years now, and it was the opinion of the special Senate committee that dealt with the Constitution, that any time the provinces may be interested in any bill, all the provinces should automatically be asked whether they would like to make representations to the Senate committee dealing with the bill. Therefore, I think that this a perfect example of where the committee chairman ought to send out telegrams to all the provinces to determine whether or not they wish to make representations.

The second point I would like to discuss concerns the impression that I got from reading about the bill in the press, and from listening to the debate in this house, and that is that the maximum age proposed is 18 years, and that struck me as a bit old. However, the bill refers to the maximum age as being under 18 years and, therefore, the maximum age proposed is really 17 years. If the maximum age is, in fact, 17 years, then the proposal from Nova Scotia that the maximum age be 16 years means only one extra year, and not two as stated by that province. Throughout Senator Asselin's comments, I think he mentioned the phrase "under 18" only once and the rest of the time referred to the maximum age as 18. I think the same thing can be said of Senator Neiman.

So, honourable senators, I wanted to point out this misconception on the part of the public and, certainly, on my part, in the hope that it will be cleared up, and that it will be widely understood that the actual maximum age is 17 years.

Senator Smith: I know that the honourable senator is not necessarily posing a question to me, but perhaps I could say a word about what he has just said. I am not sure that I can answer the concerns expressed by Senator Godfrey, in the sense that my remarks will be considered a full answer.

• (1530)

The remarks I made were based on information I had received from the Province of Nova Scotia and related to the definition of "young person."

Two-thirds of the way down page 2 of Bill C-61 it says:

"young person" means a person who is or, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, appears to be

(a) twelve years of age or more, but

(b) under eighteen years of age or, in a province in respect of which a proclamation has been issued under subsection (2) prior to April 1, 1985, under sixteen or seventeen years, whichever age is specified by the proclamation,

I cannot agree with Senator Godfrey that the difference between "sixteen" and "under eighteen" is only one year. In my interpretation it means two years less a day. This may affect a good many more persons than it would if it were just one year.

Senator Godfrey: I am not a mathematician, but if it is 16 years of age under the Province of Nova Scotia proposal, and they mean 16 years, and not under 16, then he is liable up until the day before his seventeenth birthday. Under the federal proposal, it is not 18 years of age; it is 17 years of age because he is only a young offender up until the day before his eighteenth birthday. In my calculation, that is one year.

Senator Smith: The committee may call some expert mathematicians to determine that matter.

Senator Godfrey: That is one matter that should be cleared up, because I certainly had the impression that it was 18 years of age, and that seemed to me to be high. Now, when I look at the bill, it is obvious that it is 17 years of age. I think the public would better understand if we said "17 years of age."

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Could Senator Neiman tell me if it is only the Province of Nova Scotia that has expressed some disagreement with the terms or philosophy of the bill?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, although I have not read every word of the proceedings of the 17 committee meetings which were held, I have read many of them. My general impression is that no one disagreed with the general philosophy of the bill. The one major disagreement or difference of opinion was with respect to the maximum age.

As I pointed out in my speech yesterday evening, as far as I could ascertain there was very little disagreement on the principle of a uniform age; everyone agreed that this was, in fact, necessary.

The problem, as has been stated here again, is that some of the provinces had serious reservations about what that maximum uniform age should be. Since there is a variation in the age across the country, it became a question of which age should apply. Once it was decided that uniformity was most desirable, then it had to be decided what age should be chosen. On the basis of the factors I enumerated last evening, the Solicitor General felt that the maximum age should be "up to 18 years."

The honourable senator is quite right that, when I use the term "maximum age," it may be open to the interpretation it includes the full age of 18 years. Of course, it only applies up to the age of 18 years.

Senator Smith read the definition of a "young person." There is a period up to April 1, 1985, to allow provinces, whose legislation provides a maximum age below the figure now proposed—that is, either "under 16" or "under 17"—to prepare to move to the other age. In other words, there will be a transition period. In fact, this bill will not be proclaimed for at least a year because it is necessary, for that and other reasons, to give the provinces and the federal government some time to get all the necessary organizations, government departments and everything else in place.

Senator Deschatelets: The honourable senator has said that it is most important that, when this bill becomes effective, all the provinces have a uniform age.

Unless I am mistaken, it is the Attorney General of a province who has the responsibility of prosecution under the act. The Attorney General of a province, even although he has before him the case of a crime by a young offender, may decide to proceed or not to proceed. I believe that Senator Goldenberg will agree with me that the Attorney General has this responsibility, although in the past it was exercised differently in many provinces.

As Senator Neiman has said, it is most important that, at some stage before this act becomes effective, all the provinces have a uniform age.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would add something further to my response to Senator Godfrey's remarks because, since I sat down, I have looked at the definition under the existing act. Under the existing act, Chapter J-3 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, you have to look at two definitions to see what the present age is. You must look at the definition of "child," which states:

"child" means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years, or such other age as may be directed—

And then you turn to the definition of "juvenile delinquent," which states:

"juvenile delinquent" means any child who violates any provision of the Criminal Code or of any federal or provincial statute—

Therefore, a child is a person who is "apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years". The two definitions seem to jibe. That is, the present provision is "under 16," and the proposed provision is "under 18." Mathematically, there seems to be a difference of two years.

Senator Godfrey: Were it 15 and 17, it would be more easily understood.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I hoped that, following upon my speech and Senator Smith's speech, Senator Neiman would respond to the objections we raised during the debate.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I did intend to say a few words in reply on second reading.

I want to thank Senator Asselin, Senator Smith and Senator Godfrey for the interventions they made. I believe Senator Asselin has many years of experience in criminal law and is well aware—and far more than most of us here—of the direct correlation between adult criminals and the likelihood that they started their careers as adolescents. I believe that the entire force and intent of this bill is preventive and rehabilitative. We want to stop what seems to be an inevitable progression from the juvenile courts into the adult prisons. I think that is where this bill is so beneficial. Hopefully it will create an entirely different climate in dealing with young offenders.

I think that we have touched, in several areas, on the question of the maximum age. I am sure that it will be raised again in committee. As I pointed out in my speech yesterday evening, the Solicitor General felt that there were several cogent reasons why he should suggest that the maximum age be 18 years. I must say that I am inclined to agree with him, for a variety of reasons. As far as I am concerned, one of the most important of those reasons is that I would like to treat young people as young people for the longest possible time in order to keep them out of the adult criminal system. The longer we have to deal with them within the juvenile courts, the more chance we have of helping them in later years.

I am aware that there has been much mention made in the press about the cost to the provinces that will arise as a result of the passage of this bill. I must say that a little of the publicity is overblown. In fact, some of the statements I have read in the paper—I can recall some made by Mr. Drea of Ontario—almost verge on hysteria when speaking of the possible costs to us.

When considering that we are adding another year or two to the maximum age of those being dealt with by the juvenile court system, it has to be borne in mind that we will, of course, have to provide facilities for young offenders. The whole intent of this act, however, is primarily to keep young offenders out of any kind of facilities, if that can possibly be done. Secondly, if we do have to build facilities, as undoubtedly we will, they will be of a much less secure type, and it follows that they will be much less expensive than maximum security prisons. With that in mind, therefore, in terms of dollars and cents, and with the hope, that I am sure we all want to be realized, that we will prevent many children from ending up in adult prisons, I believe that the cost to society in the long run will be much less than it otherwise would be.

A number of other comments were made by Senator Smith with respect to the administration of the act. As honourable senators are aware, the administration of the act will devolve on the provinces, as it has heretofore. I cannot put my finger on them at the moment, but I know that there are specific clauses that deal with the obligations of parents—not only natural parents but people who stand in loco parentis. I have spoken to officials in the department about this aspect of the bill. As honourable senators are aware, many young people who come into conflict with the law do so because they have no homes, as we know them; they have no proper parental guidance and care, and they often have no natural parents. They may live with grandparents, friends or strangers from time to time. I am sure that the courts will, as they have up to this point in time, interpret the in loco parentis definition in a very broad way. People in this position will be kept fully informed in order to be able to help the young offenders. On the other hand, there is a clause, which I cannot put my finger on at the moment, which provides that parents or people who have responsibility for children will also be held responsible in court if they fail to do what the court deems is their proper parental duty and, in particular, if they fail to carry out orders of the juvenile courts, or youth courts, as they are known. When we are studying this bill in committee, Senator Smith, the clause will be located and dealt with.

There are other clauses of the bill having to do with both restitution and compensation. These are principles that I believe in very strongly. We ought not to worry about whether a youth has the money to provide compensation. If he can avoid any kind of custody order whatsoever, he will find a way to work out the compensation. In fact, there are provisions made for work orders, service orders and a variety of such things. The beauty of this bill is that there is such a wide variety of choices which will be left to the authorities so that they can use their ingenuity and their compassion in dealing with young offenders.

I think those are the principal questions that were raised. I believe that if there are any provincial ministers who still wish to appear before our committee, they should be invited to attend. This bill has been long in the gestation period and it will take a little while longer before it is proclaimed, and for very good reason. I am sure, however, that we would be able to hear witnesses in order to deal with any possible objections they may have. I would certainly be prepared to recommend that the witnesses suggested by Senator Smith be invited to appear before the committee. Senator Asselin has very kindly sent me copies of the letters he has in his possession and to which he referred. We will be happy to go through the letters and invite those people to attend the committee hearings, if they so wish.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I am certainly glad to have that assurance. I wonder if I might ask one further question. I thought I understood the honourable senator to say that there would likely have to be a delay of something like a year after the passage of this bill before it would be proclaimed. I wonder if I misunderstood that statement or whether it is correct.

Senator Neiman: That is quite true, Senator Smith. As a matter of fact, the provinces have requested a delay in order to allow them to put all of the judicial apparatus in order, to make the necessary administrative arrangements, and to do whatever else is necessary before the act actually comes into effect.

There is a possibility, as I understand it, that the act does not necessarily have to be proclaimed or become effective across Canada at the same time, and that if one province were prepared to go ahead and implement it, possibly that could be arranged.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I keep thinking of something further. I wonder if I would be thought to be trespassing too much if I made reference to one of Senator Neiman's last remarks. It was to the effect that the proclamation could be such that the act could come into effect in different provinces at different times. I turned quickly to look at the commencement clause, which is, as one would expect, the last clause in the bill. Clause 81 says:

This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

I simply draw to the attention of honourable senators, if I may, that some additional words should be included in this particular clause if it is to be possible to proclaim the act in different provinces at different times.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I agree with the observations made by the Honourable Senator Smith.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 13, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for the second reading of Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I regret that I was unavoidably absent from the chamber on May 13 when the Leader of the Government moved second reading of this bill, but I have read in Hansard his thorough explanation, for which I thank him.

The major change proposed in this bill is to shorten the official election campaign from approximately 60 days' duration to a minimum of 50 days. As the minister has pointed out, this is the result of a compromise between those primarily from rural and large northern constituencies, who would have been quite content to retain the present 60-day writ, and those primarily from urban ridings, who would have been happy with a writ period of even less than 50 days' duration.

Another change that is proposed—which the minister grouped under the heading of “small changes” in his speech, but which is fraught with significance for those in our respective political parties who toil at the constituency level—concerns nomination day. Henceforth, there would be a uniform nomination day across the country, and it would be the twenty-eighth day prior to polling day. For the benefit of those members of Progressive Conservative constituency associations or, indeed, Liberal constituency associations, henceforth in a 50-day election, they will have 22 days to find and nominate a candidate. I think this reinforces the argument—which some of us make to our friends in our parties—in favour of early nominations, that is, the nomination of candidates even before the writ is issued, especially in those constituencies which we do not hold. In fact, I know that there are Progressive Conservative constituency associations, and I am fairly certain that there are also Liberal constituency associations, where 30 days' notice of the holding of a nominating convention is now required. Obviously, with a 50-day writ it would not be possible under those constitutions to hold nominating conventions, and, there again, they will either have to change their constitutions or change their ways—nominate their candidates in advance of the writ's being issued.

Under this bill enumeration is to begin on the thirtieth day before polling day. This complies with a recommendation of the Chief Electoral Officer who wanted ten clear days between the issuance of the writ and the beginning of enumeration. As I read it, the bill gives him 12 days to begin enumeration and 6 days to complete it.

Honourable senators, I must say that the enumeration process in this country is a wonder to behold. As I understand it, the parties that finish first and second in the immediately preceding election are responsible for providing lists of enumerators to the returning officer. In the hectic days that follow the issuance of a writ, these enumerators must be recruited, trained, supplied with enumeration materials and put on the roll. The process becomes more difficult with each succeeding federal election. Jobs as enumerators are not much sought after, at least in some parts of the country. The political parties that are busy setting up their headquarters, organizing their canvasses, raising money, holding conventions and getting their campaigns under way are not always terribly anxious to deploy their most active and effective workers to the task of enumeration. Therefore, the process and the result is quite imperfect.

The point I make by those remarks is that the idea of a permanent voters' list in this country is surely an idea whose time has come. I am told that it would cost $30 million a year to have such a list, but I am sure that we can find places, such as the government advertising budget, where we can save $30 million which would be better applied to the setting up and the maintenance of a permanent voters' list in the country.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): We would have to advertise the list then.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It would cost much less.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Such a list exists in Quebec.

Senator Murray: Senator Deschatelets reminds the Senate that such a list does exist in Quebec.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And they still find the money to advertise.

Senator Murray: They still find the money to do some advertising, but proportionately—

Senator Flynn: Look at the provincial budget we had last evening.

Senator Murray: In any case, the permanent voters' list in Quebec did not come under Mr. Pariseau's axe last night and was, and is, a very useful initiative in that province.

I would be the first to agree that Parliament should not rush into making changes in the elections law. There must be very careful consideration and the widest possible consensus among the political parties before amendments to the elections law are put before Parliament. It is obvious that Bill C-58 does enjoy such a consensus.

Having said that, I would make a plea to the government, and to others responsible, to get on with the consideration of a number of other important amendments, some of which were recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer following the general elections of 1974, 1979 and 1980, but which still have not been dealt with. For example, a decision will have to be made soon whether the spending limits on parties and candidates ought to be raised to take account of inflation. At the same time, Parliament will, I believe, want to reconsider the formula for the reimbursement of candidates. As I understand it, that formula is based on the cost of a mailing to constituents using first class postage which was at eight cents. With a 30-cent first class rate the reimbursement to candidates could, in some cases, equal 100 per cent of the candidate's allowable expenses. I think that is a matter that Parliament will want to consider, and consider relatively soon.

Another matter—and this is a horse that I have flogged once or twice in committees of the Senate and elsewhere—concerns the reimbursement to national parties which is made on the basis of their expenditures on advertising in the electronic media of radio and television. That, of course, creates a strong incentive—the incentive of a 50-cent dollar—to parties to put their advertising dollars into radio and television. However, I, for one, would like to see a formula introduced which would make newspaper advertising eligible for the same subsidy, whatever it may be, that is granted to the parties in respect of radio and television advertising.

I remind the Senate, and the government in particular, that several months ago the Trudeau administration entered the third year of its present mandate. In the normal course of events we should have a general election within two years. I believe it is important that the matters I have mentioned, and a number of other matters contained in the Chief Electoral Officer's reports, be attended to before the next election. As I understand it, the Chief Electoral Officer has convened an ad hoc committee of representatives of the various parties, which has been working on some of these amendments, and it is up to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the other place to begin taking these recommendations into consideration, and recommending them to the government and to Parliament by way of amendments to the act.

Finally, there is the matter of redistribution, on which the Honourable the Leader of the Government and I have had several exchanges in recent weeks. Under the present schedule, as it is envisaged by the government, the new electoral boundaries, as set up pursuant to the 1981 census, would probably not be in effect before October 1984, which might well be too late for the next general election. It may very well be 1988 before an election is fought on the basis of the 1981 census. I say that that is too slow. I say it is unfair to members of Parliament and to their constituents, especially in ridings that have had very significant increases in population over the past 10 years or more. The process can be speeded up, and, in fact, I am delighted to say that part of it has already been speeded up somewhat.

A few days ago, on May 20, to be exact, the government passed an order in council setting up the redistribution commissions in the various provinces and territories. I obtained a copy of the order in council today.

Senator Frith: Legally?

Senator Murray: It is not a leak. I called the Privy Council Office.

Senator Frith: No. I asked, "Legally?"

Senator Perrault: It must have been slipped under the door.

Senator Murray: It wasn't slipped under the door. It was passed on May 20, and I called someone in the Privy Council Office, who sent it to me just before the Senate sat today.

There are some very familiar names on these redistribution commissions. The former Premier of Prince Edward Island, now the Honourable Mr. Justice Campbell, is the chairman of the commission of that province. The former Attorney General of Nova Scotia, now the Honourable Mr. Justice Pace, is now the commissioner of that province. The former head of the Combines Investigation Branch, now the Honourable Mr. Justice Henry, is the chairman of the commission of this province. These are just a few of the names that leap off the page. I am sure that in such competent hands—

Senator Flynn: They were very well picked.

Senator Murray:—it will be possible for these commissions to complete their work. I was delighted with these appointments, because the government had 60 days, from March 30, in which to appoint these commissions, and they accomplished the task in approximately 40 days.

The point I make, therefore, is that the process can be speeded up and that we need not expand the process to fill the maximum allowable time. It just might be that if the rest of the process proceeds as expeditiously, or more expeditiously, we could have the redistribution in shape for the next federal election, certainly if it takes place in 1984. Otherwise, honourable senators, I have no comments to make on the bill. I am primarily concerned, as I have indicated, with what is not in the bill, and with those matters that I insist should be reformed and attended to by the government and Parliament before the next federal election.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has made some very useful suggestions about indexing certain things, in effect, and there is one that I would like to add, which is the $100 limit on disclosure as far as contributions to campaign funds are concerned. If you are going to index other things, I suggest that that should be raised to at least $200.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable senator for that suggestion. I hasten to say that I carefully avoided suggesting that the expense limits should be indexed to inflation, but I did say that the government and Parliament should consider whether the expense limits should be raised to take some account of recent inflation. There may be a case—indeed, the case has been made—for the proposition that in a number of larger rural and northern constituencies, which may, however, have smaller populations, there should be special and higher limitations. I simply make the point that these matters can be, and ought to be, disposed of well before the writ is issued for the next general election.

Senator Godfrey: I only used the word "index" for brevity.

Senator Flynn: Your suggestion is based on your experience as a collector?

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: I would like to have some information on what was referred to as a permanent voters' list. Apparently, it exists in Quebec, and I would like to know something about its functioning.

A permanent voters' list, to me, seems impossible. I checked this afternoon the list of senators here, and I find that 26 are missing since 1976. If we want to project that, how can a list be permanent with some going and some coming? I would like to ask for some clarification. I really do not know how it could work.

Senator Flynn: It is revised continuously by the returning officer.

Senator Frith: In general, honourable senators, what happens—they do this in Australia—and the reason it will cost extra money, as I understand it, is that it just becomes one of the things you have to do when you move. You have to give notification, and there is a commission that keeps track of where everybody moves to, and then those moves are incorporated into the permanent list.

Senator Flynn: And there is a revision before an election.

Senator Frith: There is a revision before an election. That is the Australian system, I think. It does require, as Senator Robichaud implies, a great deal of additional attention in following the moves that the population makes in order to keep the list, as effectively as possible, always up to date. That is why it costs extra money beyond what is already spent. His point is, as I understand Senator Murray, that it is worth it.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I just want to say a few words to show that I am in agreement with the bill and its principle. The idea of shortening election campaigns to 50 days is, I think, a very good one. Like Senator Murray, I would have liked to see a few other things considered at this time, but that has not been done.

So far as the 50-day idea is concerned, I think I am right in saying that the government can give a longer period than 50 days if they wish, but 50 is the minimum. I have no doubt that in many cases that would be so. Nomination 28 days before polling day does present some difficulty. I can anticipate that at the time of the first election under the new system it might be difficult to arrange to hold conventions, particularly in the smaller areas where the three parties might want to hold their conventions at approximately the same time. We do not always have large halls. There might be one hall, and all the parties cannot use the hall at the same time. However, I dare say that difficulty can be overcome.

I am not impressed with the argument that we should have permanent lists. Enumeration is a good idea. It gives us a completely new list. It is not all that difficult to make. There is the idea that the returning officer must gather all the enumerators and instruct them, and so on. But it takes very little time. The parties usually can get their enumerators without very much difficulty, and then the returning officer usually takes two days, at the most, to hold a meeting or seminar where the enumerators are instructed in their duties. This system works very well, and we do have confidence in the list if it is a brand new one.

If we have the nomination 28 days prior to the election, it enables the law to be changed so that early voting can take place three weeks before the election, where formerly it was only two weeks. That is a good idea. The early voting aspect could have been improved by allowing the deputy returning officers to take care of early votes. As it is now, a person who wishes to vote early must go to the office of the returning officer. That is awkward for many people who live some distance from where the returning officer is located. Indeed, in my own area, I can see where a person may have to travel 30 or 40 miles. The situation could be simplified by saying that the deputy returning officer, looking after the poll in that area, could also look after the early voting. I do believe that the present system is a little too cumbersome.

The same situation applies to advance polls. Under the provisions of the act an advance poll has to be set up for each polling division. Within seven days after the writs are issued the parties can ask for others and that can be done. It means that the number of advance polls is set before the candidate is nominated. There should be a discretion that the returning officer could provide more advance polls and locate them wherever the candidates ask for them. In other words, there should be no difficulty for people going to the advance poll. With regard to my own area, I know that there was one advance poll where we should have had three. We did not get into it soon enough, and had we asked for three I feel sure we would have had them. The returning officer should have more discretion in that regard.

The committee in the other place studied the bill thoroughly. If I recall correctly, the committee held five sittings, but stuck with the bill. I was rather surprised that some additions to the bill were not advocated. The addition that I would like to see concerns simplification of proxy voting. The present method is too complicated. A person can act as proxy only once and it has to be in the same polling division. I see no reason why a person could not act for a number of voters. Perhaps an agent of the candidate could act as proxy for voting. It appears that the draftsman has a suspicion that people will try to take advantage and do things that are not normally done. After all, these days elections are pretty well open and shut. We have always followed the principle: "Get out as many voters as you can, and then we will trust they will do the right thing." There does appear to be a suspicion that we must guard against anything that might happen. I believe that to be totally wrong. Let us suppose that a person is ill. In order to get a proxy voter, he would have to get a letter from the doctor, and it has to be on the doctor's own letterhead. At the last election some of us got doctors to write proxies on their prescription pads, and the returning officer accepted them, but technically it was not correct.

Senator Perrault: So that is how you did it!

[Senator Macdonald.]

Senator Macdonald: But we didn't win. University students have to get something from their registrar, or their parents have to go to the returning officer. I cannot understand why students who attend universities outside of Canada cannot vote by proxy. If they were attending university in Canada they would be able to. I fail to understand that situation. I also advocate travelling or mobile polling stations, which could go from hospital to hospital or from senior citizens' home to senior citizens' home, where people could vote without too much difficulty.

Having said that, I support the bill. I cannot see any need to send it to committee for further examination. After all, it has been examined by those who are most interested in elections.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Perrault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise to thank those honourable senators who have participated in this debate: Senator Murray, with his experienced insight into the election process; Senator Godfrey, with his superb qualifications, as someone who knows a great deal about the election—

Senator Flynn: Financing.

Senator Perrault:—process and how successful elections are organized; and certainly Senator Macdonald, who draws upon his vast experience in the maritimes to inspire his constructive ideas for further reforms.

The ideas advanced by these honourable senators are interesting and worthy of further study. While there is some disagreement in this chamber as to the value of a permanent voters' list, in some jurisdictions it is thought to be a great advance. Senator Murray said that he marvelled at how the present system works. We on this side marvel at times—

An Hon. Senator: We like the results.

Senator Perrault: Most of the time we like the results, but not always.

Senator Frith: More in the east than in the west.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I had that in mind.

With regard to the process of educating scrutineers, one often observes the apparent chaos involved in that process, and one wonders how it is possible to produce any list at all; but, by and large, the electoral list is well prepared and well done—in fact, assembled most competently and efficiently—by the Chief Electoral Officer and his people.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I believe you meant to say "enumerators".

Senator Perrault: Yes, enumerators. Did I say "scrutineers"? However, all parties need excellent scrutineers as well in the constituencies. It is obvious that beyond the amendments before us, further changes will be required in the Canada Elections Act. The bill before us represents only some steps along the path of reform. Further changes, we can all feel sure, will take place over a period of time.

● (1620)

Perhaps most of us in the Senate can agree, and all of the political parties can agree generally, that this bill represents an improvement. I thank honourable senators for the constructive comments they have made, and I pledge that a transcript of today's Senate proceedings will be brought to the attention of the appropriate offices. The views of honourable senators on this important matter of electoral reform deserve to be better known. Some of the ideas are obviously excellent.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE
RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—
ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I ask that this order stand until the next sitting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will Senator Perrault tell us whether he intends to speak tomorrow?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I plan to speak tomorrow. I had hoped to speak today, but it is somewhat late now.

Senator Flynn: That is fine, as long as we know that you are speaking tomorrow.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

THE ARMY, NAVY AND AIR FORCE VETERANS IN CANADA—
MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-25, respecting The Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 27, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILL

E.G. KLEIN LIMITED—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 27, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-26, intituled: "An Act to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act", has in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, May 18, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. CARL GOLDENBERG,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg, for Senator Leblanc, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 1, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Apparently there are no questions. Delayed answers?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Charbonneau asked a question the other day, to which I now have an answer. Since he is not in the chamber this afternoon, I suggest that we await his presence before the reply is given.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We want to give Senator Olson a rest.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He made a good speech last evening.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twelfth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments which was presented yesterday.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, in speaking on this report, I hope there will be no misunderstanding or mix-up with the motion which stands in my name in which the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is also mentioned.

I refer honourable senators to section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act which provides that:

Every statutory instrument . . . —

Which includes regulations.

—shall [with some exceptions] stand permanently referred to any Committee . . . that may be established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments.

Honourable senators will notice that nothing is said in that section as to the purpose of the review. Why should this committee be scrutinizing?

Some hint of what was in the mind of the draftsman may be found in section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act, which states:

(1) Where a regulation-making authority proposes to make a regulation it shall cause to be forwarded to the Clerk of the Privy Council three copies of the proposed regulation in both official languages.

(2) Upon receipt by the Clerk of the Privy Council of copies of a proposed regulation pursuant to subsection (1), the Clerk of the Privy Council, in consultation with the Deputy Minister of Justice, shall examine the proposed regulation to ensure that

(a) it is authorized by the statute pursuant to which it is to be made;

In other words, to ensure that it is intra vires, and not ultra vires.

(b) it does not constitute an unusual or unexpected use of the authority pursuant to which it is to be made;

(c) it does not trespass unduly on existing rights and freedoms and is not, in any case, inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights; and

(d) the form and draftsmanship of the proposed regulation are in accordance with established standards.

• (1410)

Then subsection (3) reads as follows:

When a proposed regulation has been examined as required by subsection (2), the Clerk of the Privy Council shall advise the regulation-making authority that the proposed regulation has been so examined and shall indicate any matter referred to in paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of that subsection to which, in the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, based on such examination, the attention of the regulation-making authority should be drawn.

Therefore, there is no provision, after the draft regulation has been read and considered by the Deputy Minister of Justice, for anything further to be done except that the attention of the regulation-making authority must be drawn, if necessary, to any matter referred to in paragraph (a), (b), (c) or (d) of subsection (2). Section 3 makes it quite obvious that any committee established under the Statutory Instruments Act should consider those four matters in connection with regulations that have already been passed. In addition, the committee, when it was first established about eight or nine years ago, decided there should be eleven additional criteria. For example, Criteria No. 8 is:

appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rules of natural justice;

I should also point out that under section 29 of the Statutory Instruments Act section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights was repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council, examine every regulation transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council for registration pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act and every Bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part—

That is, the Bill of Rights.

—and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

As far as I know, the Minister of Justice has never reported to the House of Commons any regulation as offending the Bill of Rights, and has only once reported a bill, and that was in connection with an amendment that the Senate made to the Feeds Act in 1975. The Minister of Justice reported it as being inconsistent with the Bill of Rights and it was, therefore, turned down.

It can be seen that under the present system there are regulations that are looked at after they are drafted by the Deputy Minister of Justice and the Clerk of the Privy Council—that is the executive branch of the government—and then, after they are enacted, looked at by the Minister of Justice himself who, if he finds there is any infringement of the Bill of Rights, is supposed to report that infringement to the House of Commons. In addition to those two safeguards, there is the third safeguard from the legislative branch of government in that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments also looks at the regulations after they have been passed, and reports on any that are inconsistent with the Bill of Rights.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is not mentioned, of course, in the Statutory Instruments Act, and there is no statutory provision for the Clerk of the Privy Council and the Deputy Minister of Justice to look at draft regulations to see whether or not they are inconsistent with the new Charter. I am sure that eventually the Statutory Instruments Act will be amended to provide for this machinery, and also machinery for the Minister of Justice to report. In the meantime, our committee wishes to carry on with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as far as regulations are concerned, in exactly the same way as we have with the Bill of Rights.

To distinguish the motion that stands in my name on the Order Paper, I will say that it concerns any bill that is presented to Parliament. There is nothing corresponding to section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, and no statutory provision whereby the Minister of Justice draws the attention of the House of Commons to any infringement.

Therefore, I, as an individual and not as joint chairman of the committee, will move that bills be referred to the committee. I do this to draw to the attention of other committees, and so on, the fact that there may be an infringement of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

● (1415)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask my honourable friend a question for purposes of clarification. In his statement he noted that the Deputy Minister of Justice looked at these regulations after they were "enacted." That was the word he used, but I do not suppose he meant it.

Senator Godfrey: The Deputy Minister of Justice and the Clerk of the Privy Council look at them before they are enacted. Then the Minister of Justice looks at them after they are enacted and draws them to the attention of the House of Commons. This applies to any case where there may be an infringement of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

On motion of Senator Perrault, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE
RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 25, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 19, the Government of Canada filed with the Supreme Court of Canada a reference concerning jurisdiction over seabed resources in the Hibernia area off the shore of Newfoundland.

The action has been criticized by the Premier of Newfoundland and by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland. A highly publicized "day of mourning" was declared in that province. The premier of that great province thought it appropriate to urge support for his position by other premiers and by Canadians from coast to coast.

The position of the Premier of Newfoundland has won some degree of support in this chamber. Two, or perhaps three, of our colleagues have spoken in support of the motion before us. They, too, have condemned the referral to the Supreme Court by the Government of Canada. In the process of debate yesterday the Government of Canada was accused of "politicizing the judicial system," "reneging on agreements," "taking action without precedent," "renouncing previous position" and—I am quoting the words—"intellectual dishonesty," "dangerous authoritarianism threatening the judicial and legislative process," "employing a scam," "taking unprecedented action," "destroying Confederation," "pitting our federal and provincial courts against each other," "starting the break-up of the judicial system," "insulting the Appeal Court of Newfoundland," and "casting a slur of contempt on the Supreme Court."

[Senator Godfrey.]

This is only a partial list from the "indictment" read by the senators who spoke against this federal government action.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That should be enough.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and a number of other allegations were made. It was rather incredible.

Those who have looked at the facts and researched them, however, can only be appalled by the excessive language employed by these critics and the inaccuracy of the charges.

It is unfortunate and alarming that any honourable senator or any level of government would accuse any other level of government of such a distorted list of sins of alleged omission and commission. I do not propose to use the kind of language used in this chamber yesterday by opposition speakers, but I do hope to set forth an accurate account, a factual account, to demonstrate that the government's referral to the Supreme Court is not only justified, but is legally and morally defensible. Can one excuse certain charges made yesterday?

One of the speakers in this chamber said that he had not had time to do "adequate research." It is unfortunate solid research was not done before he spoke, because it may have helped to ensure a more constructive debate. First of all, I will begin by quoting part of the statement made by the Minister of Justice in Newfoundland on May 19, when he spoke there at 2.30 in the afternoon. He said:

● (1420)

The Government of Canada has today filed with the Supreme Court of Canada a Reference concerning jurisdiction over sea bed resources in the Hibernia area offshore Newfoundland.

Because the matter is before the court I am not in a position to comment on any details on the legal issues, but I do want to tell you something about the reasons why the Government of Canada has found it necessary to take this step.

Our two governments have, for months and years—

Honourable senators, the negotiations began in 1968—or perhaps a year or two earlier—and have carried on for over 14 years. Continued attempts have been made to determine who has legal ownership of these offshore resources, and, apart from ownership, how those resources should be shared.

The minister said:

Our two governments have for months and years been discussing both the question of offshore jurisdiction and an agreement on revenue sharing and resource management. But these negotiations have always floundered because of the underlying dispute over the legal issues.

When the United States encountered a similar situation with respect to the Gulf states during the term of the late President Eisenhower, the United States government said to the states, "First of all, let us determine the ownership of these resources. Let us know, first of all, who owns them legally." As some honourable senators recall, President Eisenhower then referred the matter to the U.S. Supreme Court. That court decided that the resources were clearly under federal jurisdiction in the United States. Then, on the basis of that judicial finding, the president met with the Gulf coast states and negotiated a 50-50 sharing of revenues. First of all, however, it was felt to be essential for the courts to determine legal ownership of the offshore resources—a view held not only by the Gulf states but by the national government of the United States.

This is what the federal government here has been seeking. This is what the province of Newfoundland has been resisting.

The Minister of Justice went on to say:

The provincial government has recently filed a reference to the Provincial Court of Appeal. The questions raised by a number of complex issues in addition to the question of jurisdiction in respect of Hibernia, including the status of inland waters, the territorial sea and perhaps the interests of other provinces as well.

Honourable senators, the reference to the Newfoundland court encompasses many other issues, some touching upon the Gulf of St. Lawrence, St. Pierre and Miquelon, and other major and complex issues. A Newfoundland minister said recently, "Yes, this court case could drag on over four or five years before any decision is made." The fact is that the Newfoundland court will not even get to the case before October.

Honourable senators, I would not want to accuse the Government of Newfoundland of delaying for political reasons, but other more suspicious and political people have suggested that. And yes, the federal government will participate in that reference. Again, I repeat these words from Mr. Chrétien's statement.

We are participating in that reference and will continue to do so, but in the meantime it appears to us necessary to move to have the urgent and pressing question of jurisdiction in Hibernia resolved at the earliest possible date by the highest court, the Supreme Court of Canada.

The prospects for Hibernia production are very promising indeed.

These are particularly promising for the province of Newfoundland, honourable senators.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Particularly for your government!

Senator Perrault: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister has offered 100 per cent of all of the revenues of that field until Newfoundland achieves a so-called "have" status, with, assuredly, a continuing very generous division at some point in the far distant future.

Hon. C. William Doody: A lovely man!

Senator Perrault: Yes, indeed he is, and he does not deserve the kind of attack levelled against him in recent days in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Poor man! Don't make us cry.

Senator Perrault: Again, honourable senators, I quote Mr. Chrétien:

We are participating in that reference and will continue to do so, but in the meantime it appears to us necessary to move to have the urgent and pressing question of jurisdiction in Hibernia resolved at the earliest possible date by the highest court, the Supreme Court of Canada.

The prospects for Hibernia production are very promising indeed. We consider that these resources are presently very close to commercial production. Development will require heavy investment that can only come within an established regime. The major oil companies which are conducting the exploration need to have answers very soon as to what level of government has jurisdiction.

● (1425)

Honourable senators, unbelievably the opposition members critical of this action by the government are the same opposition spokesmen who remind us constantly of the need for certainty in the tax regime. They preach in this chamber that "business must know where it stands," that certainty in the area of taxation and other economic policies is the only way that business can help to build a strong economy. Yet, paradoxically, in the matter of the Hibernia reference and what could be, potentially, the early development of a very large oilfield on the east coast, they continue to advocate that the resource ownership issue be allowed to wallow in uncertainty, without any early legal decision. They foster the concept of uncertainty and delay. I ask, why? Perhaps they can tell us.

The major oil companies have asked for this degree of certainty, and we must act to give them a firm legal basis on which to proceed.

Not a Newfoundland court decision, which may come down in four or five years, and then a possible further appeal to the Supreme Court, some time after that, with further delays.

Senator Flynn: Why do you say that?

The development of these resources is to the benefit of all, the people in Newfoundland, as well as other Canadians. Delaying development perhaps for years is unacceptable to all concerned. We need the oil that the offshore promises to yield. Perhaps, most of all, I believe that the provincial economy is going to enjoy the important contribution offshore development can make to its prosperity; and the new job opportunities and economic stimulus await the political settlement between the federal and provincial governments.

The pernicious myth, which is being circulated, that somehow there is a covetous national government out to crush poor little Newfoundland and annex all of its resources is totally false.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Stick to the facts!

Senator Flynn: Don't get excited!

Senator Perrault: I note that the former Premier of Nova Scotia, Senator Smith, is in his usual truculent mood, something like that of a baseball fan up in the bleachers hurling abuse on the umpire; but let me tell him that his own province of Nova Scotia has negotiated an excellent arrangement whereby they keep something like 75 per cent of all the offshore resource revenues. They demonstrated some common sense by achieving a fair and sensible agreement.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. The honourable gentleman said he was going to put the facts on the record.

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of privilege.

Senator Smith: Just a minute. I have the floor. All I ask is that the minister stick to his promise and stick to the facts.

Senator Perrault: I am sticking to the facts.

The truth is, the facts concerning this issue have not been brought to the Senate up to this point. It is time they were.

While the legal issues must be resolved, we are still willing to meet with negotiators for the Newfoundland government to explore ways of managing resource development and providing for a generous revenue-sharing arrangement with the government of Newfoundland.

So much for the wild and nonsensical scenario of a greedy federal government rolling into Newfoundland like the SS moving into Czechoslovakia, attempting to crush and to deprive economically Canada's great Atlantic province.

Mr. Chrétien continued:

We are anxious to find a mechanism for co-operative management, one that can be implemented no matter what ruling the Supreme Court gives.

There is a chance, of course, and Newfoundlanders say that there is an excellent chance, that the Supreme Court is going to find in favour of the province. So be it—but let us have certainty. The minister further said:

So it is a statement I wanted to read to you and to make clear what we are doing. The application has been filed today in the Supreme Court of Canada, not on all the issues of offshore, but only on the site of Hibernia, because we feel that it is, as I said in my statement—I feel that it is close to being ready for development, and it's quite important that this be clarified so that the oil that might come from there might benefit as quickly as possible the economy of Newfoundland, and the resources needs of Canada.

That is the statement. It is a rational statement, a statement made with a considerable degree of logic, and, I know, sincerity.

We were told the other day, among the lurid items on that "indictment," that there are no precedents for this action by the government. Senator Lang said, "Of course, I have not completed my research." I wish he had. It might have helped. Are there any precedents?

Senator Flynn: Invent some.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): He does not need to.

Senator Perrault: Invention of facts is a sport at which the Leader of the Opposition is a past master. I would not attempt to invent facts as he does, on a daily basis, in this place.

Senator Flynn: You cannot prove that.

Senator Perrault: He does it with alacrity and ability, and all of us marvel.

Senator Flynn: Bring on your facts.

Senator Perrault: All right. Supreme Court references have often been taken while issues are before provincial Supreme Courts. I now produce a partial list:

1976, the Anti-Inflation Act; 1970, the Breathalyzer Act; 1955, Eastern Stevedoring; 1948, Saskatchewan Minimum Wage Act; 1946, Japanese deportation orders; 1943, chemicals; 1943, U.S. forces; 1938, the Adoption Act; 1935, the Temperance Act; 1934, the Tariff Board; 1934, case S-110 of the Dominion Companies Act; 1928, fish canneries. In the most recent 50-year period this process of simultaneous reference began with a classic reference by a Conservative government in 1932 with respect to the Broadcasting Act while the case was before the Quebec Court of Appeal. Those are critics—

Senator Flynn: Not on a reference.

Senator Perrault: Yes, on a reference, and obviously the Leader of the Opposition has not done his research. When statements are made in the Senate that the federal referral is "unprecedented," that such actions are "going to destroy the system of courts" in this country, then I suggest that honourable senators have failed in their responsibility to check the facts.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: You are reciting something you know nothing about.

Senator Perrault: I am reciting a list of precedents that troubles the opposition deeply because of their oratorical excess of yesterday. They realize that only the big "scam" is on that side.

An Hon. Senator: You are not supposed to use language of that kind.

Senator Perrault: Yet, the opposition applauded the use of that same word yesterday when it was employed to attack the government. In the case of the Radio Act of 1932, which in a sense began this interesting process, the federal government directly referred a question to the Supreme Court after a similar question had been referred to the Quebec Court of Appeal by the Government of Quebec—and this is part of the judicial record. Then we are told solemnly by opposition spokesmen "that there are no precedents" for the federal action, an action which is abhorrent to the Conservative Party and which "politicizes the judicial system." Apparently, the concept is not abhorrent to the leader of the Conservative Party; not abhorrent to Mr. Clark, because this is what he said when the constitutional question was before the Quebec courts. He said the following, in his eloquent way, as it appears at page 8850 of House of Commons Debates for April 1, 1981:

[Senator Perrault.]

What we have done today is propose that the government adjourn debate on the resolution now before this House and thereby allow Parliament to get on to other urgent business of the nation. It would also allow the government to send to the Supreme Court of Canada, either by following the appeal procedure or by reference, a question which would determine the legality of the proposal we are being asked to judge.

It did not trouble the opposition that the same reference was before the Quebec Court of Appeal.

Senator Flynn: There was a decision of Manitoba and Newfoundland.

Senator Perrault: Yes, it came before other courts as well.

Senator Flynn: You are misleading the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps enough time has been spent on this point. There are ample precedents to justify the federal action.

Senator Frith: And to justify Mr. Clark.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that Mr. Clark must feel relieved that there are ample precedents to support his suggestion of April 1, 1981.

Senator Flynn: He will be surprised to learn the interpretation that you put on it.

Senator Perrault: Then we are told that the federal government was "playing games" in the SIU intervention. Well, has the Government of Canada been playing games? The Prime Minister sent a telex to Premier Peckford of Newfoundland on February 12, 1982, and it might be useful to read it into the record. He said:

I have reviewed your telex of February 10, 1982, regarding the negotiations we are currently conducting on the subject of offshore resource management and revenue sharing.

I would like first to deal with what appears to be a misunderstanding on your part of the basis on which we have been negotiating.

The federal government's offer to negotiate the offshore issues of resource management and revenue sharing was contained in my telex to you of July 27, 1981. In that telex, I clearly and explicitly set out the federal position on ownership as follows:

The legal position of the federal government is predicated upon the 1967 judgment of the Supreme Court to the effect that rights to offshore resources on the West Coast belonged to the federal government. It has always been our position that this judgment applies as well to the East Coast offshore. Our divergence of views on ownership has introduced an element of uncertainty which would eventually impinge adversely on an orderly development of these resources. We are both aware that the ownership issue cannot remain unresolved much longer.

● (1435)

That is an accurate statement.

This leaves the federal government with no alternative but to see that this matter is resolved by one means or another through the legal process.

The Prime Minister went on to say—and we are getting down to the Seafarers' International Union reference which comes later in the text:

You will also recall my position that if we failed to reach an agreement on resource management and revenue sharing by this month of February, 'we should await the outcome of the legal process, which would of course mean that any future negotiations would start from a different base.' The federal government has in the past proposed to the Newfoundland government that a direct joint reference to the Supreme Court, with wording agreeable to both of us, is one method of obtaining a clear legal judgment. This proposal was never accepted.

It was never accepted by the Province of Newfoundland.

Senator Asselin: Of course.

Senator Perrault: The national government, which stands accused of having no respect for the courts, proposed to Mr. Peckford a joint reference to the Supreme Court of Canada with wording agreed upon between the two levels of government. This sensible and fair proposal was rejected by Mr. Peckford. Why? Who is frightened of the judicial process? Who is concerned about what the courts may rule?

Senator Asselin: The Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: Not the Prime Minister, but the Premier of Newfoundland and some of his supporters. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

I also referred in the telex to the appeal by the Seafarers' International Union to the Federal Court of Appeal in the following terms:

If I understand you correctly, you suggest that the federal government not present its arguments on the jurisdiction issues raised by that case. I would like to point out that it is not the federal government that has raised the ownership and jurisdiction question in the context of the SIU case.

And Senator Lang made a charge, and I think it is a despicable charge. Senator Lang said, as is reported in the Debates of the Senate of May 25, 1982, at page 4186:

Finally, the federal-provincial agreement to support an application to adjourn the SIU appeal was renounced by the federal government on February 1, 1982.

This is a malicious untruth. It is not factual and there is no evidence whatsoever to support it. Indeed, the proposal to incorporate reference to offshore jurisdiction in the SIU case was made by the Crosbie Offshore Company and by the Seafarers' International Union. It was not a federal initiative. Perhaps our Conservative friends from Newfoundland can ask the Crosbie family why this action was taken.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

The federal government, like the Newfoundland government, is only an intervenor in the case and does not control the issue on which the court is asked to decide.

When the Crosbie family and the SIU decided they wanted that issue included, then, of course, the federal government had to intervene and state its position. I am sure honourable senators know that, especially those with any legal training.

Senator Flynn: Obviously, that was not your case.

It is the principal parties in the case which placed this issue before the Federal Court for decision, partly in response to an earlier decision by the Newfoundland Labour Relations Board which dealt with the matter of ownership and jurisdiction.

Yet, the other day this government was accused of dealing in bad faith, reneging on an agreement and attempting surreptitiously to slide in the offshore jurisdiction issue in the matter of the SIU case which went before the Federal Court. Honourable senators who make charges of this kind should know better. Indeed, documents filed in the Senate itself help to give the lie to that charge.

I come back to the telex:

In any event, the issue will be heard by the Court regardless of the position taken by the federal government or, for that matter, the Newfoundland government.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

I took particular care to re-affirm the federal government's position on ownership and to respond to your concerns over the SIU case in order that there would be absolutely no misunderstanding of the nature of our offer to negotiate the issues of resource management and revenue sharing.

Does that sound like a government—

Hon. Lowell Murray: No!

Senator Perrault: —that is determined to subvert the best interests of Newfoundland?

Senator Doody: Certainly, it is not a reasonable government.

Senator Perrault: The Premier of Newfoundland is saying that the federal government is being "unreasonable." Perhaps the world needs a new dictionary of definitions, with a special edition for the Conservative Party.

From the fact that you accepted the invitation to negotiate contained in my telex of July 27, 1981, I could only conclude that you understood my position and were willing to negotiate in that context the issues of offshore resource management and revenue sharing.

Nevertheless, as Mr. Lalonde has pointed out in his recent discussions and correspondence with Mr. Marshall on February 9, the federal government was prepared to remain neutral on the Newfoundland government's motion to delay proceeding with the SIU case. As you know, the Court denied that motion this week.

● (1440)

Does that sound like a government interested in subverting the judicial system?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Perrault: A government without respect for the law? Of course not! Charges of the kind we heard yesterday are ludicrous and are not worthy of the Senate.

The history of negotiations and agreements on the offshore has been quite different in Canada than is suggested by the Australian experience you use in your telex. In the Canadian case, there was no legal resolution of the ownership issue, (which we believe would provide the most secure and enduring basis for any agreement on resource management and revenue sharing)—

And we have achieved an excellent agreement with Nova Scotia. The Premier of Nova Scotia, who is a Conservative, says it is a great deal for the people of Nova Scotia, and it is a great deal because he had the good sense to sit down and negotiate.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking out of both sides of your mouth. A moment ago you were criticizing the Conservatives and now you are praising them.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator will have the right to speak in defence of this shabby kind of motion in due time.

Senator Flynn: You are quite noisy in your denial of free speech.

Senator Perrault: Well, of course, Senator Flynn claims that he believes in free speech. But he continues to interrupt. All talk!

Senator Flynn: It is not.

Senator Perrault:

The Prime Minister continued:

—and successive governments at both the federal and provincial levels, have changed their positions; in one case—concerning the 1977 Memorandum of Understanding with the Maritime Provinces—one provincial government walked away from an arrangement which had been signed in good faith by a previous government.

He then went on to say:

I should note that from the moment the current negotiations began, federal officials have made it abundantly clear that this government viewed the resolution of our offshore dispute as one that would proceed on three tracks. On one track, the ownership question would be resolved by the courts.

Would any honourable senator criticize that position? What's wrong with that? Most other governments in similar situations have done the same—have had their courts decide legal ownership. I repeat:

On one track, the ownership question would be resolved by the courts. But more importantly, on the second track we would aim in our talks to reach—by February 28, 1982—a pragmatic agreement on a long-term, stable, resource management and revenue sharing arrangement to which both parties would commit themselves regardless of any court decision on ownership.

What is wrong with that? Is that unreasonable?

A third track was discussed as well, that of ensuring that Newfoundland captures as many of the economic benefits as possible from the development of the offshore.

Yes, 100 per cent for a period of years. Has any other province been offered a deal like that? Certainly, Alberta has not had a deal like that.

Senator Flynn: That is not the point.

Senator Perrault: British Columbia has not had an offer like that. Is an initial 100 per cent not enough?

Hon. Eric Cook: It is not 100 per cent.

Senator Perrault: Or does Mr. Peckford want 110 per cent?

Senator Cook: All we want is the revenues that would be coming to us if the resources were on the land; that's all. We are not going to get 100 per cent.

Senator Frith: You are getting 100 per cent of all the revenues.

Senator Flynn: You are not discussing the issue.

Senator Perrault:

Mr. Lalonde articulated this view again with Mr. Marshall during their meeting on January 8.

In other words, in view of the possibility of third-party actions (like the SIU case), the challenge was to arrive at a fair settlement regardless of ownership—

What's wrong with that?

—but to ensure that that settlement would stick, if and when ownership was eventually decided by whatever means in favour of one side or the other.

Surely, that is a path of action designed to develop these resources as quickly as possible, fairly, and with a good and generous deal for Newfoundland and a fair arrangement for all of Canada.

Consequently, we must ensure that any settlement we reach contains enough safeguards to prevent its abrogation by either party. I hope that our teams of negotiators can devise such safeguards to ensure that each party remains committed to implementation of the agreement. It has always been my position that we could reach a long term agreement without determining ownership. I continue to believe that in the next two weeks we can achieve such an agreement which would survive any decision on ownership by the courts.

As you are aware, the details of our proposals require further elaboration.

Senator Asselin: You are just reading the statement.

Senator Perrault: The statement worries you because it destroys your argument so completely, senator.

Senator Asselin: You could save a lot of time if you just tabled the statement.

The appropriate way to pursue these matters is to resume discussions at the level of Ministers and senior officials. Mr. Lalonde is prepared to continue to meet with Mr. Marshall on an urgent basis over the next two weeks.

Finally, I would simply like to reiterate a point made in my July 27th telex to you. I wrote then that "the jurisdiction issue should not be allowed to obscure the requirement to find a solution that best meets the needs of the people of Newfoundland and all Canada". That solution, of course, encompasses a cooperative approach to both managing the resource and sharing the revenues it generates. In many areas, such as forestry, our two governments have in recent years cooperated to encourage resource development regardless of who owns the resource.

I am sure that you share my hope that we shall arrive this month—

And remember that he wrote this in February 1982.

I am sure that you share my hope that we shall arrive this month at a settlement which will reflect the interests and responsibilities of both governments. More than that, it must respond to the pressing energy security and economic development needs of Newfoundlanders and all Canadians.

I am confident that, even with the short time remaining, we can build the framework for cooperation which will ensure the best possible development of our rich offshore oil and gas resources.

Does this sound like an arrogant letter, an unfair letter? Of course not! It is a fair, reasoned, rational, moderate letter by the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Newfoundland.

But you know what we were told by one of the participants in the debate yesterday? As an example of alleged federal arrogance and inferred duplicity, he implied that the federal government forced the Newfoundland offshore issue in the SIU case. Remember those ringing words in the Senate? He told us that the federal government had forced the SIU reference and had attempted to slip it in the court case, when he should have known that it was Crosbie Resources and the SIU who sought a decision regarding jurisdiction. And yes, in his verbal assault he said that the federal government had gone "silent" on February 10 of this year. Yes, it went silent for a brief 48 hours because the constructive and conciliatory letter of the Prime Minister in response to the telex is dated February 12. In other words, the Prime Minister sent this reasoned response 48 hours after that so-called "silence". It was inferred that there was this ominous "silence" by the federal government. Well, there have been many other occasions when governments have taken longer than that to give a response.

What is the chronology of this negotiation? I regret the time this is taking, but these serious charges were made yesterday and last week.

Senator Flynn: The motion does not deal at all with what you are discussing. You are going outside the question.

Senator Perrault: Going back to 1958 and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has total recall of those traumatic days—a United Nations conference at Geneva adopted the Convention on the Continental Shelf, which provides that the coastal state exercises over the Continental Shelf exclusive sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring it and exploiting its natural resources. The Convention defines the shelf as the seabed and subsoil of the submarine areas adjacent to the coast but outside the territorial sea to either a depth of 200 meters or beyond that to where the water depth allows exploration of the natural resources of the shelf.

I will not take this forward year by year from 1958. Suffice it to say that, after considerable consultation with the provincial governments, the federal government referred the question of the jurisdiction and ownership of the submerged resources off the west coast of Canada to the Supreme Court of Canada by means of an Order in Council dated April 26, 1965, which was tabled in the House of Commons on April 29, 1965.

The problem of offshore mineral resources was discussed at the federal-provincial conference on July 21, 1965. As in previous federal-provincial discussions, there were substantial differences of view as to the respective rights of the federal government and the coastal provinces and the means by which a resolution of those differences should be achieved.

Senator Flynn: May I rise on a point of order? The Honourable Leader of the Government has been quoting from the statement made by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice said that he could not deal with the substance of the dispute between the two levels of government because it was sub judice. I suggest that the Leader of the Government is doing exactly that, and that it is contrary to our rules. He should stick to the motion. The motion is only critical of the decision to send the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada while the matter is before the Appeal Court of Newfoundland.

I think the Leader of the Government should ask the Minister of Justice whether what the leader is doing now is proper. To me, it is absolutely improper, as well as being irrelevant.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that the process may be uncomfortable for the senator.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Perrault: It may be uncomfortable, but it is not improper.

Senator Flynn: It is not at all uncomfortable. If you want, you can do it, but, of course, you don't understand what you are doing.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: I am giving a historical account of the events which led up to a government action, which is the subject of the motion, and I hope honourable senators will read and study the record once it appears in print.

Senator Flynn: It's not relevant, not at all.

● (1450)

Senator Frith: The reference is the subject of the motion.

Senator Perrault: In 1965 representatives of several of the provinces expressed the view that the matter was one for immediate—the Leader of the Opposition would absorb much more information if he would not talk so much when others are speaking.

The representatives of several of the provinces expressed the view that the matter was one for immediate negotiation. The federal position was reiterated, that the extent of federal and provincial legal rights should be determined before negotiation. Prime Minister Pearson stated that if the rights to the offshore were found to lie with the federal government, "equitable arrangements may then be negotiated"—which was always the position of Liberal governments.

The Advisory Opinion of the Supreme Court was handed down on November 7, 1967. The court was unanimous in finding entirely in favour of the Crown in the Right of Canada with respect to the resources of all the submerged lands lying seaward of the "ordinary low water mark," and so on.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I formally rise on a point of order and ask His Honour to rule on the question of whether the Leader of the Government is right in dealing with the substance and pleading the case.

Senator Frith: No, he is not doing that.

Senator Flynn: Yes, he is pleading the case. He is quoting the decisions and discussing the differences of views between the two levels of government. It is entirely out of order, and I ask Your Honour to rule on this point. The Leader of the Government does not understand what he is doing anyway, so try to tell him.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition, it seems to me that if there is a point of order on the sub-judice rule—and I understand his point on that—he has raised it a fraction too soon. With respect, the sub-judice provision would apply if the speaker proceeded, after recounting the events of the 1967 reference, to say: "And, therefore, I believe that the Supreme Court of Canada should follow that ruling." That is when he gets into law. All he is talking about now is history. It is a fact, not a matter of law, that that court so decided.

Senator Flynn: If you are satisfied that he can go outside of the rules, I do not care.

Senator Frith: I do not believe he is going outside of the rules. A formal point of order was raised—

Senator Flynn: If no other senator wants to object except me, I do not care.

Senator Frith:—and I am addressing that point of order. I submit, Your Honour, with reference to the invitation to make a ruling, that the only point at which the sub-judice rule would be infringed would be if the speaker argues what decision the Supreme Court of Canada on this reference should make. All he has said so far about that is that it is open to the court to decide either for the federal government or for the provincial government. Therefore, he is not arguing the case and he is not trying to persuade us that the court should decide it in a certain way. He is simply recounting events that led up to the reference that is the subject matter of the motion.

Senator Flynn: I deny that, because the manner in which the Leader of the Government was reciting the decision of the Supreme Court in the matter of the west coast was really to put the case of the federal government before the Senate, and that is sub-judice.

Senator Perrault: It is historical.

An Hon. Senator: Hysterical!

Senator Flynn: Historical, my foot! I do not mind if His Honour rules that that is allowed, but my objection will be on the record, and the support of the deputy leader for something irregular will also be on the record.

Senator Frith: It is support for something quite regular.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not know if the Leader of the Opposition insists on a ruling—

Senator Flynn: I certainly do insist.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is he asking me to decide if the rules of the Senate have been violated, or that when a case is sub-judice it should not be dealt with? In the first case, this is something that I can decide on. It is in the Rules of the Senate, but I am not sure which rule you are referring to.

Senator Flynn: They are both applicable because you cannot discuss either in the press, or in the Senate, or in the House of Commons a matter which is before a court. The Rules of the Senate are applicable in the present case as well as being applicable to a newspaper or anywhere else. It is quite obvious.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Quote the rules.

Senator Flynn: Oh, for goodness' sake!

Senator Frith: If you are going to insist, then, in order to help His Honour, I could refer to Beauchesne. My honourable friend refers to Beauchesne when it is helpful to him and otherwise says it can decide anything, but let us see what it says. The sub-judice rule, found at pages 118 and 119—and I have not looked this up in advance so I am bound by whatever it says—states:

335. Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub-judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

336. (1) The sub-judice convention has been applied consistently in criminal cases.

(2) The precedents in criminal cases are consistent in preventing—

And so on. Citation 337 reads as follows:

(1) No settled practice has been developed in relation to civil cases, as the convention has been applied in some cases but not in others.

(2) In civil cases the convention does not apply until the matter has reached the trial stage.

338. (1) Matters before a royal commission are not subject to the convention.

(2) When an appeal is taken to the Governor-in-Council—

That does not apply.

Citation 338(4) reads as follows:

The reference of a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that bill—

This is not a bill.

—temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament. If the constitutional situation of human rights is submitted to the Supreme Court, it thereby becomes sub-judice and cannot be considered by a committee of the House until the Court has given its decision. The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time.

Senator Flynn: Two courts.

Senator Frith: Precisely. I agree with that, and I agree with the Leader of the Opposition's statement of the sub-judice rule. I have not quarrelled with him on that, but it is not properly invoked yet in the speech that has been given by the Leader of the Government. I submit, Your Honour, that no rule of the Senate has been infringed by discussing the events that led up to the reference. If the speaker, or any other speaker, argues that the Supreme Court of Canada ought to decide the matter in a certain way, which the speaker has specifically not done—he said it was open to decide it either way—then that might be an occasion for invoking the rule. In my respectful submission to His Honour, no rule of the Senate, either specifically or in parliamentary procedure by reference to Rule 1, has been breached so far.

Senator Perrault: May I speak to this point? My endeavour has been to set forth a 14-year chronology in short form; the history of attempts to achieve an agreement with the Atlantic and other coastal provinces—including the Province of Newfoundland—with respect to offshore resources. I am not making any qualitative judgment on rulings by the courts, but am merely setting forth the facts.

It seems to me that it is essential in a debate to provide some rationale or justification for the government's action. I am rather surprised that the Leader of the Opposition would take exception to this, because surely he wants the facts put on the record.

Senator Flynn: The question that was put to me by His Honour was to prove the existence of the rule, and the deputy leader very kindly did that by referring to Beauchesne. The rule was also mentioned by the Minister of Justice in his statement in St. John's that was quoted by the Leader of the Government himself, where he said: "I cannot discuss the substance of the problem because it is before the courts."

Senator Frith: We do not want to do that. We are dealing with the motion.

Senator Flynn: In any event, the motion is whether it is proper to have a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada while the same problem is before the Appeal Court of Newfoundland. That is the only thing.

Senator Perrault: That is what I am speaking to.

Senator Flynn: No, you have been reciting the problem between the two levels of government, whereas the motion is on the question of procedure. If you want to do it, go ahead.

Senator Perrault: The statement was made the other day that the government had acted in what it was suggested was a unilateral, arbitrary manner. I have made the point that for 14 years—indeed, for more than 14 years—patiently and constructively the government has attempted to achieve an arrangement. I seek only the opportunity to put those facts on the record.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on this point, I gave a speech in this chamber on the Constitution when there was an appeal reference from the provincial courts. I researched this matter with considerable care prior to the argument, and I came to the conclusion that it was perfectly in order for me to discuss the Reasons for Judgment of the provincial court until the case was actually being considered by the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1500)

Senator Flynn: I suppose that settles the question.

Senator Perrault: I thank the learned senator for his opinion.

Honourable senators, I will not go into all the details of the chronology, but I would just mention that on December 2, 1968, Prime Minister Trudeau made an announcement setting out an offer whereby the provinces would receive half the revenues accruing from offshore mineral resources located seaward of mineral resource administration lines established off provincial coasts. The areas seaward of these lines would be administered by the federal government, and the areas landward of the lines, from which the adjacent province would receive all the mineral resource revenues, could be administered by the adjacent province.

Discussions with coastal provinces on offshore mineral rights have continued intermittently since the Prime Minister's announcement. In discussions with east coast provinces, the first ministers involved agreed, in August 1972, to set aside the questions of jurisdiction and ownership and to try to reach agreement on the practical matters of administration and revenue sharing.

I note the rapt interest of the Leader of the Opposition; he is joking with his colleagues in the back row of the chamber. I hope the Conservative Party is more concerned about this issue than that.

Senator Flynn: I am not joking.

Senator Perrault: Several meetings of federal and provincial officials were held in the period from October 1972 to May 1973, which were supplemented by another meeting of first ministers on April 9, 1973.

I now reach the stage of the chronology where the Province of Newfoundland is mentioned.

A September 27, 1973 submission by Newfoundland to the federal government signalled that province's effective withdrawal from these particular discussions. Honourable Senator Doody, I am sure, is aware of this chronology. The Newfoundland submission envisaged the federal government's transferring to the province administration and control over mineral resources offshore from Newfoundland and Labrador. Continued correspondence with the Newfoundland government and a ministerial meeting in November 1974 failed to settle the impasse.

If any of this record is incorrect, I am sure it will be corrected in the course of this debate, but these are the facts as I understand them.

In April 1976, agreement was reached between the federal and Newfoundland governments so that they could work together to prepare a joint reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to settle the questions of jurisdiction and proprietary rights as regards offshore mineral resources. Many people said, "Amen; we have finally achieved an agreement!"

After entering into substantial and significant negotiations on this point, for reasons best known to themselves, the Newfoundland government decided to abandon that course of action. Following Newfoundland's withdrawal from the discussions, the maritime provinces and Quebec attempted to work out a common position. The four provinces could not reach agreement, however, and Quebec took no further part.

Meaningful discussions resumed between the maritime provinces and the federal government in early 1976, and the end result is the Memorandum of Understanding signed on February 1, 1977. Great progress was made with the three maritime provinces. Newfoundland refused to enter into the agreement believing, presumably, it had a special position, and, perhaps, the courts will determine that.

To update the chronology, and without going into it in excessive length, honourable senators, a Memorandum of Understanding was signed on February 1, 1977, by the Prime Minister, which I have described, outlining the principles of a new regime for joint federal-provincial administration and management of the mineral resources of areas lying offshore from those provinces. The memorandum provides for an agreement between the federal government and the three provinces under which the mineral resources would be managed by a board composed of three federal members and one member from each of the three provinces.

Revenue sharing under the agreement would be on the basis of 25 per cent for the federal government and 75 per cent for the provinces. I understand that this may be a larger provincial share than the Province of Alberta enjoys, although there are many aspects to the Alberta agreement which make it a very good deal for all.

As far as revenue is concerned, under our energy agreement, the federal government receives 35 per cent, and the Province of Alberta receives something like 65 per cent. Therefore, the Nova Scotia agreement is very generous.

That is why it is difficult to understand some of the charges from Newfoundland, such as, "We don't want to be robbed of our heritage. We want the same kind of deal they got in Alberta!"

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: If they get the same kind of deal as did Alberta, the percentage could well be lower in terms of revenue return to Newfoundland than the agreement achieved with that western province.

The Nova Scotia formula for revenue sharing—beyond the initial period of 100 per cent for Newfoundland—would be on the basis of 25 per cent to 75 per cent. In the case of Nova Scotia it is 75-25. And within lines situated at least five kilometres off the coast and seaward of any coal resources accessible by mining from land, 100 per cent for the provinces—in the case of the Sable Island area, 100 per cent for Nova Scotia.

Federal and provincial officials were progressing towards a detailed agreement, and the federal-provincial legislation required to implement it, when the change of government in Nova Scotia in September 1978 stalled the discussions which had led to an agreement with that province and its Conservative premier.

Senator Murray: I would ask the Leader of the Government to reflect for a moment on whether the facts that he has been setting out for the last few minutes, in particular, are not going to form part of the case that will be argued before the Supreme Court of Canada, and whether, in so doing, he is not in fact seriously breaching the sub-judice rule.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, these are the facts.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I make my comments for the benefit of the Leader of the Government. I would ask him to reflect for a moment on whether the facts he has just been setting out, especially in the last couple of minutes, do not constitute part of the argument that will be made before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Although I am not a lawyer, I would be extremely surprised if the whole business of the agreements and negotiations with Nova Scotia and other maritime provinces, the delineation of the boundaries that are involved and so on, did not constitute part of the case that will be argued before the Supreme Court of Canada. In that case, the minister is, in fact, breaching the sub-judice rule.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the distinction that ought to be underlined is that the sub-judice rule does not prevent reference to any facts that might possibly form part of the record before a court. The minute a court decides that it is seized of an issue, it does not mean that any fact that can be brought before that court cannot be referred to.

Senator Frith: If that were so, they may be objectionable on some grounds, but not on the sub-judice ground.

I think the best and clearest example of what might constitute a breach of the sub-judice rule would have occurred if the speeches made last year by Senator Smith and myself on the offshore rights of Nova Scotia—and, impliedly, the rights of Newfoundland—had been made while the matter was before the Supreme Court. I am referring to the speech made by Senator Smith when he took the position that the B.C. case of 1967 did not decide Nova Scotia's rights, and when I took the position that it did apply to Nova Scotia and, colaterally, we both spoke of Newfoundland. If that matter had then been before the Supreme Court, I think every lawyer would agree that it would be in breach of the sub-judice rule because we were discussing the legal merits of the case. With respect, that is not what the Leader of the Government is now doing.

Senator Perrault: At the First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution from October 30 to November 1, 1978, at the behest of the Premier of Newfoundland, the Prime Minister of Canada accepted offshore resources as an item on the agenda for constitutional review.

During the First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution on February 5 and 6, 1979, the Prime Minister tabled a draft federal proposal that accepts the principle of concurrent legislative authority over the management of offshore resources, with federal paramountcy for some elements of the management régime and provincial paramountcy for others, but leaves aside the question of ownership. To give effect to the constitutional change contemplated, the proposal anticipates the design of complementary administrative arrangements as a means of assuring continued federal-provincial co-operation and consultation. Honourable senators, that is hardly an arrogant act; hardly an act which would warrant some of the statements made about the Prime Minister and this government in recent days in the Senate.

In 1979, during the federal election campaign, the leader of the Conservative Party—let us put that on the record, too—Mr. Clark, promised to give coastal provinces, and Newfoundland in particular, ownership of offshore mineral resources. This was followed up by Prime Minister Clark, from the time he was elected, in meetings with the premiers of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, and by way of letters from the Prime Minister to the premiers of all of the provinces.

In 1980, during the federal election campaign, Mr. Trudeau stated that his government would assert federal ownership of offshore resources, but would negotiate co-operative resource management and revenue-sharing with the coastal provinces: 100 per cent of the revenues to flow to coastal provinces until they achieve a "have" status, after which broader sharing with Canadians would begin.

Yet, honourable senators, we were told, the other day in the speech made by Senator Lang, something quite different. He was talking about federal assertion of sovereignty and said, as reported at page 4186 of Senate Hansard:

Then after an offer by Newfoundland, on February 10, 1982, to set aside sovereignty as an issue . . . the federal government went silent.

In the same paragraph, Senator Lang spoke in terms of the federal government's having reneged on an agreement for joint management. Honourable senators, that is a gross inaccuracy on the part of Senator Lang. He said, as well, that the federal government had given a commitment in May. No such agreement ever existed; it exists purely in the mind of the honourable senator.

Senator Lang then stated that this commitment was followed by the federal government's assertion of sovereignty in December 1981. Honourable senators, we have always asserted federal sovereignty. That is part of the continuing record of this matter; it is nothing new. The federal government has always maintained ownership but has always held itself willing to negotiate resource-sharing and management arrangements. There was no change in the federal position at that time.

To complete the chronological record, honourable senators, during the First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution in September 1980 "offshore resources" was included as an issue on the agenda. At this time, the federal government offered the proposal which Mr. Trudeau had outlined during the election campaign. Agreement was not reached. The 100 per cent offer to Newfoundland was rejected.

In July 1981 the Prime Minister wrote to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, and Mr. Chrétien, Minister of Justice, wrote to British Columbia, offering to resume offshore negotiations.

On March 2, 1982, the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia concluded an agreement on offshore resource management and revenue sharing which is currently being implemented. Negotiations are anticipated with British Columbia over the next several months. Negotiations with Newfoundland have, of course, reached this impasse, and I do not want to talk about the merits of these references—

Senator Murray: I hope not!

Senator Perrault: Those events have led to this particular debate.

Honourable senators, what kind of chronology is this? Is it the type of chronology which deserves to be described as a subversion of our parliamentary process, as an attempt to destroy the courts, as an attempt to crush one of our provinces?

[Senator Perrault.]

Honourable senators, it is a record of painstaking attempts by the federal government, over 14, 15 or 16 years, to try to reach some agreement—as any other self-respecting country would do under similar circumstances—to have the courts finally assess who owns the resource and then to make sure that the coastal provinces receive a fair share of that resource.

Honourable senators, in July 1981 the Prime Minister, who has been described in such uncharitable terms, to say the least, wrote a letter to Mr. Peckford, and I quote it, in part:

● (1520)

Thank you for your recent telexes to me seeking clarification of the Federal Government's overall position on offshore resources.

The legal position of the Federal Government is predicated upon the 1967 judgment of the Supreme Court—and so on.

Senator Murray: Now, now; there you go!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will not continue—

Senator Murray: Well, then, don't!

Senator Frith: What happened when my back was turned?

Senator Perrault: In referring to a speech he had made earlier, the Prime Minister went on to say:

As I made clear in my speech and in subsequent interviews with the media, the Federal Government is most anxious to renew discussions with provincial authorities with a view to solving the present impasse on the issues of resource management and revenue-sharing through negotiations. To that effect, I would like to propose that we undertake a round of negotiations beginning in the fall with a view to resolving all outstanding matters.

Honourable senators, I would be pleased to provide all of his correspondence to the outspoken critics in the Senate chamber and let them delineate the areas they think are open to fair criticism. The Prime Minister has made a substantial effort indeed to achieve agreement.

I realize that other honourable senators will rise in this debate to speak to other points—

Senator Flynn: Speak to the point!

Senator Perrault: We read, in the recent speech of Senator Lang, that this government is "dangerously authoritarian to the extent that it can threaten our judicial and legislative processes." We have heard the view that, if there is disagreement between the two courts, somehow this poses a danger to our judicial system. That situation has existed for years, and I hope that honourable senators, during the debate, will provide some arguments as to why there is something wrong with one court's decision being reversed by another court, or with differences of opinion as between the two courts. We also have a record of simultaneous references to the courts, which I think is of some significance in the course of this debate.

I want to conclude my remarks, honourable senators, by reading to you a rather good letter from an elected member of the other place in reply to Premier Peckford, who sent a telex to all Newfoundland members of Parliament—presumably to honourable senators as well.

Senator Cook: Not to this honourable senator!

Senator Perrault: This letter was written by Roger Simmons, M.P., Burin-St. George's:

Thank you for your telegram of May 20 concerning the offshore issue.

You ask do I condemn the action of the federal government in referring the matter to the Supreme Court. I certainly do not. And for two reasons. First, I cannot condemn an initiative which will serve to resolve the question of offshore jurisdiction as soon as possible. And secondly, how can you ask me to condemn the self-same action which your administration took last February? Are there two sets of rules? Are you suggesting it is all right for one party in a dispute to take an action but all wrong if the other party takes the same action?

I regard it as unfortunate and as indicative of the lack of goodwill which has recently characterized the Newfoundland offshore talks that there had to be two separate references. That wasn't always the case. You will recall that you agreed in 1977, in your then capacity as Newfoundland Energy Minister, to place a joint Canada-Newfoundland reference before the courts. Unfortunately, you subsequently changed your mind. Had you not done so, the court would have undoubtedly resolved the issue by now, and the important Hibernia development would be proceeding, to the substantial benefit of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Where do I stand you ask? I am pleased to have the opportunity to tell you and the people of Newfoundland.

I stand for an agreement which provides for an adequate voice by both governments in managing the offshore development and which provides for a sharing arrangement which is fair and generous to Newfoundland.

I stand for a resolution of the offshore jurisdiction question.

Senator Flynn: We all do!

Senator Perrault:

Only the courts can resolve that question. Your proposal that the ownership issue be set aside permanently—And this is what Newfoundland has proposed, that for evermore the ownership issue be set aside and never decided upon, which is contrary to the views of the private sector who want to develop the resources.

—is not in the best long-term interests of anybody, either the people of Newfoundland or the people of Canada as a whole.

You talk often about the Churchill Falls deal as a give-away which, in today's circumstances, it is, but which at the time could not have been viewed in today's circumstances, a fact which probably explains why the Churchill Falls deal had the unanimous support of the House of Assembly, including all members representing your party, something which you have conveniently not bothered to mention in your selective recall of the events of that period.

If Churchill Falls has taught us anything, it is that we shouldn't be too anxious to enter into long-term undertakings. And yet you insist on an agreement which would permanently set aside the offshore ownership question. In so doing, you would be robbing Newfoundlanders forever of the chance to put to the test this important issue.

● (1530)

I have long felt that Newfoundland has a very strong case to support its claim to offshore jurisdiction. You have often stated publicly your belief in the strength of Newfoundland's case for ownership. Why then are you afraid of a decision by the courts?

That is a question that is being asked by many Canadians these days. Why is Mr. Peckford seemingly afraid of the courts?

Senator Cook: How can you blame him for going to the courts, on the one hand, and, on the other, say that he is afraid of the court's decision? Let us have it one way or the other.

Senator Perrault: Let us listen to the balance of the letter. Senator Cook may even applaud it. Mr. Simmons continues as follows:

Is it not in everyone's best interests to have the question settled once and for all? I firmly believe so.

I welcome the call in the House of Assembly resolution for a return to the negotiating table. I assume from your support of the resolution that the provincial government is willing to return to the table. If so, I commend you and your administration for an encouraging change of position since Mr. Marshall stated in Montreal that your administration would not participate in further negotiations until certain pre-conditions were agreed to by the Government of Canada. Your change of position recognizes an elementary but nevertheless important principle of negotiating, namely, that the place to negotiate is at the table, not in the media.

Mr. Simmons says, finally:

Now that both sides in the dispute have taken similar initiatives in referring the question of jurisdiction to the courts, now that both sides have stated a desire to return to the negotiating table without pre-conditions, I call upon you to set the wheels in motion to recommence negotiations without further delay.

Kindest personal regards.

I think that is an excellent letter from a son of Newfoundland who has done an immense amount for his province, indicating that there are people in Newfoundland very much in disagreement with those who read into federal government actions the worst possible motives.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982—(Honourable Senator Lafond).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to speak to this order. It stands in Senator Lafond's name, but perhaps honourable senators will permit me to speak to it.

I am not quite clear what Senator Lafond wants to do about it, and have therefore re-read his intervention of some two or three days ago. I understood that he was prepared to let the matter be considered debated, unless some other senator wanted to speak to it. He also said something about the possibility of the government's wanting to let it be dropped from the Order Paper. But this is his report, and so it seems to me to be up to him, and that is why I wanted to keep it open for him to close the debate.

I am putting this all on the record in the hope that he will let us know on Tuesday whether he intends to close the debate on it, and that might provide another, and final, opportunity for other honourable senators who want to speak to it to do so. I am sure Senator Lafond would yield to them if they wished to speak.

In the meantime, it seems that, although I do not have his authority to say so, he wants this order to stand.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-THIRD MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks rose pursuant to notice of May 13, 1982:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-third Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Key Largo, Florida, from 4th to 8th March, 1982, and to the Report of such meeting.

He said: Honourable senators, on May 13 I tabled, and caused to be appended to Senate Hansard of that day, the report of the twenty-third meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, which had been held on March 4 to 8 in Key Largo, Florida. I would like to say just a little about the meetings and the subjects discussed at them.

First of all, these meetings have been going on between Canadian and American parliamentarians for over 20 years, and have, I believe, provided some very important opportunities for the exchange of information and the debating of issues among parliamentarians of both countries. I think that the meeting in Florida was no exception to those that have preceded it. It dealt with a great many matters on which Canadians and Americans have to focus attention and which hopefully will enable them to resolve the positions that are often divergent, as adopted by the two countries.

The format of the meetings is generally, I believe, and certainly was this year, arranged around three committees, with the plenary sessions occupying far less time than the subject matter that is dealt with by the various committees.

The committees were, first, Committee I, dealing with trade and economic questions, and those who are not going to read the whole report, and I do not suggest that that is necessary for all honourable senators, might at least look at pages 4106 to 4107 of Debates of the Senate of May 13, with particular reference to the agenda of Committee I, on trade and economic questions, bilateral trade and investment issues, and the GATT ministerial meeting.

The Canadian co-chairman of that committee was the Honourable Senator Roblin, and he may wish to enlarge upon what I am going to say about it a little later. In addition to Senator Roblin, Committee No. I had as members Senators Doody, McElman and van Roggen from this house.

The agenda for Committee II is set out at page 4115, and the only Canadian senator sitting on that committee was my colleague and seat-mate, the Honourable Senator Lapointe. This committee dealt with energy questions, divided into seven different aspects.

Finally, on page 4117 of Hansard, Committee III agenda is set out. This dealt generally with a number of bilateral environmental issues, some of which I will refer to briefly in a moment, and then with some multilateral questions ranging from the Law of the Sea Conference to the North-South issues.

I would like to say a little about each one of these committees, though I shall not take too much of the time of the house. I should say that, in addition to myself on Committee III, Senators Asselin and Lafond participated from this house.

In discussing trade and economic issues in Committee I, the U.S. delegation hit hard, and repeatedly, at FIRA. This subject, in fact, provided a recurring theme for discussions on trucking, on the U.S. "reciprocity in trade" topic, and on the GATT ministerial multilateral meeting. A new congressional emphasis was evident this year on the need for multilateral regulation of trade in services, and Canadian investment restrictions became a prime target in this context.

United States complaints in regard to FIRA included FIRA's requirements for a minimum percentage of local content, its pressure for domestic procurement, for export commitments and for reduction of outlets used solely for distribution. Canada was not giving foreign firms equal treatment, they alleged, and was providing a very bad example to the developing world. But the most frequently aired U.S. criticism of FIRA concerned its discretionary powers, the "Star Chamber" quality of its decision-making with no appeal and its lack of transparency. While the Canadian delegation spoke out in defence of most aspects of FIRA, on this latter point U.S. critics were joined by some Canadian delegates in stressing the need for opening up FIRA's procedures.

With respect to the National Energy Program, U.S. delegates raised the question of the over-all thrust of the legislation which, in their view, gave an unfair advantage to the Canadian energy sector and provided a precedent which might be followed in other Canadian industries. They referred to the unfair trade impact of the mega-projects sourcing board and described the national energy policy "back-in" provision as "expropriation without compensation." Canada was urged to raise the level of compensation even if it did not change the policy.

A discussion on automotive trade centred on the advanced state of the Japanese industry, the uncompetitiveness of the North American industry due mainly to high wage rates and insufficient use of robots. A controversy cutting across both delegations arose between those who believed in the necessity for content rules and restraints and those who favoured a more open trading system with no "crippling" of the industry by content rules and a conviction that "this old industry" should eventually be supplanted by high technology industries, as Japan was doing.

Other complaints raised by the U.S. side in regard to Canada included its "trade-inhibiting actions" in respect to trans-border data flows; its duty remission scheme with Volkswagen which reduced the market for North American vehicles and, it was alleged, could violate the auto pact; its cheap west coast lumber exports made possible by what our American friends described as "artificially low stumpage rates"; its compulsory licensing of drug patents at a 4 per cent royalty rate; its "aggressive promotional attempts to market the Candu reactor"; its barriers to the granting of operational authority for U.S. trucking concerns; and its vastly increased flow of potatoes into U.S. east coast, and particularly Maine, markets. In each case, the Canadian delegation responded with clarifications, corrections or counters to the points raised by the other side.

Canadian delegates, for their part, raised the following Canadian concerns with their U.S. counterparts: U.S. overfishing on Georges Bank; the concept of sector-by-sector provisions in U.S. reciprocity legislation; the negative impact for Canada's satellite telecommunications carrier if unimpeded access were granted to U.S. carriers and U.S. procurement rules, in particular the Berry amendment which would affect Canada's defence industry. So much for Committee I.

Committee II dealt with the National Energy Program. Committee II's mild discussion on the first item on the agenda belied the strong U.S. concerns on this subject expressed in Committee I and in the plenary session. The passage through Congress of the waiver bill for the Alaskan gas pipeline was described and problems associated with the pricing of the Alaskan gas were aired. Despite increases in U.S. gas reserves, there was optimism on the U.S. side that the Alaskan pipeline would be built without government guarantees or funds. U.S. participants, concerned by western Europe's possible dependence on Soviet gas, were interested in the prospect of exporting northern Canadian gas to Europe.

Advances and difficulties in developing synthetic and alternative fuels were described by both delegations. Tar sands and oil shale conversions were immensely costly; coal gasification was also expensive and required water. With nuclear electrical generation being resisted by environmental lobby groups, the U.S. side said its preferred route was to turn to coal combustion. This seems to me to have a great many inherent dangers in itself, because in Committee III we were very much concerned about the damage caused by acid rain, largely originating from coal combustion plants and other industrial enterprises in the Ohio River valley of the United States.

The U.S. side was supplied with information regarding the size and extent of the Hibernia field. In respect to electricity, there was recognition that electricity exchanges between the two countries were mutually beneficial, but that jurisdictional problems existed on both sides. So much for Committee II.

The three problems that engaged most of our attention on Committee III were acid rain, Law of the Sea, and Central America.

On acid rain, the Canadian delegates emphasized the magnitude and the irreversibility of the destruction of lakes by acid rain, acknowledging that both U.S. and Canadian pollutant sources were the cause of a problem which required urgent action. While displaying a sensitivity to Canadian concerns, U.S. delegates provided depressing evidence that the current mood in Congress and in the United States was unlikely to lead to the necessary controls. They reported that members of both the Senate and the House faced political pressures arising from widespread concern over the economy; the private sector was trying to discredit the findings of the scientific community; environmentalists were being blamed for the recession; an alliance between labour and business was arguing that controls would cost jobs; U.S. environmentalists were not making themselves heard in Congress; and the Environmental Protection Act budget had been substantially decreased.

On Eastport, the U.S. side registered a protest against Canada's unilateral imposition of a 5,000 ton limit on vessels passing through Head Harbour Passage. Later, this Canadian unilateral action was referred to as a possible precedent in respect to Seattle's plan to construct a power dam on the Skagit, but the U.S. side said that at least they had legal grounds, based on earlier agreements, to go ahead on the Skagit.

In regard to salmon interceptions on the west coast involving Alaskan waters, U.S. delegates warned of a forthcoming court decision which would immeasurably worsen the already bad situation. Fisheries management questions affecting the Stikine River and Dixon Entrance were also discussed, the latter complicated by the unsettled coastal waters boundaries question.

In the Law of the Sea discussion, the Canadian side expressed the hope that the United States would be flexible, would agree to sign the important international treaty and would refrain from entering into mini-seabed mining agreements. It raised the possibility of accommodating some U.S. concerns, including a more effective role in the decision-making International Seabed Authority and some restriction on the proposed automatic transfer of technology. On these two points, U.S. delegates reiterated the strong U.S. reservations, based on considerations of national security and the impossibility of having 150 equal partners. Some cautious optimism was expressed that the United States "would take what it could get" and sign the treaty, but the U.S. side was by no means unanimous in this regard.

A U.S. spokesman said construction of those portions of the Garrison Dam project which did not affect the Hudson Bay watershed were going ahead, and he insisted that no transfer of biota would take place under the present plan, a fact disputed by the Canadian side which referred to the International Joint-Commission report. Reservations as to the cost and effectiveness of the project were expressed by certain U.S. delegates.

Wide-ranging exchanges on Central America gave special attention to the El Salvador situation as well as to the appropriate U.S. and Canadian roles in the area. The impression was left during this exchange and during discussions on Poland that the United States was experiencing a sense of isolation in its widespread foreign policy burdens. There was no clear consensus as to how the United States should deal with expanding Central American problems. Recognizing past U.S. policy shortcomings in the area, U.S. delegates asked if there should not be a U.S. military umbrella over the area in order to contain what they called "the far left" while making it clear that no one wanted a military intervention. Reflecting differing points of view, they discussed U.S. backing of the El Salvador elections, the likelihood that Guatemala would soon become a new crisis point, and the possibility of endorsing the recent Mexican initiative. Canada was repeatedly urged to play a more important role in the area.

On the Middle East, U.S. delegates said the Camp David accords currently provided the only framework for continuing talks. Satisfaction was expressed that the eastern Sinai withdrawal was taking place, but there was anxiety over the precarious South Lebanon situation. The Canadian side, while supporting Camp David, wondered if a more comprehensive approach was not now needed to bring about a Palestinian settlement.

Finally, discussions on Poland, in which the U.S. delegates displayed a generally tougher line than Canadians on the question of U.S.S.R. involvement, led to their reiteration of the increasing U.S. frustration at lack of allied co-operation in containing the U.S.S.R., and a reference to a growing sentiment for withdrawal of U.S. troops from Europe.

Honourable senators, that is a quick overview of the topics that were discussed, some of them in great detail and with large measures of disagreement, but with some measure of agreement.

I might conclude my remarks by observing that Canadians are often wont to say that Americans know nothing about Canada and do not understand Canadian problems. There may be a certain amount of truth in that, as it may apply to a great many Americans, but it was certainly not the case with the American senators and congressmen who attended those meetings. They were well informed, were well briefed, had a wealth of data on Canadian affairs as well as their own, and they will continue to be, as we always know them to be, tough negotiators. I hope, however, that these parliamentary exchanges may establish the kind of personal contacts that, either directly or indirectly, make it easier for us to resolve our problems in a manner satisfactory to both countries.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 1, 1982 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 1, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT—ABSENCE FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed with messages from the House of Commons, I should like to advise the house that Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate is engaged on government business on the west coast and will not be here this evening.

THE HONOURABLE SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD THE HONOURABLE FREDERICK WILLIAM ROWE

FELICITATIONS ON AWARD OF HONORARY DOCTORATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to advise the Senate that two of our colleagues recently received academic honours.

A few weeks ago the University of Saskatchewan conferred on Senator Buckwold the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: On May 28, 1982, the degree of honorary Doctor of Letters was conferred on Senator F. W. Rowe by Memorial University. Following the conferring of that degree, Senator Rowe gave the convocation address.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

EXCISE TAX ACT PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-112, to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-114, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM: UPDATE 1982

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last evening the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources explained to the House of Commons a few of the reasons why the National Energy Program of the government has failed. Is it the intention of the honourable minister to give us some further elaboration of the failure of this important policy and to explain some of his recent answers in which he was most insistent that the policy was a success?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can give an explanation of—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You certainly can, as usual.

Senator Olson:—the improvements that were announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last evening. I would be very glad to do that, honourable senators, and in as much detail as those opposite would like.

For example, I have with me a fairly extensive document of about seven or eight pages which gives the national perspective of the improvements announced last night.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Why don't you just resign and be done with it?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Do we get a copy?

Senator Olson: In addition, I have with me a separate, but somewhat more focussed, explanation dealing with each of the 10 provinces.

[Senator Buckwold.]

However, I believe that a list of these very important clarifying statements was sent to each senator's office. If that is not the case, I would be glad to assist in the expedited transmission of this to senators' offices.

Senator Asselin: When will that be?

Senator Olson: In any event, we believe the improvements that were announced will be significantly beneficial to a large number of the oil and gas companies and particularly the smaller companies.

Senator Asselin: It could be worse.

Senator Olson: I will go into as much detail as my honourable friends would like.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. About a year or a year and a half ago, an agreement was signed between Alberta and the federal government, which is generally referred to as the oil-pricing agreement. In light of all the improvements, what is the status of that agreement?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, some amendments were made with respect to the taxation measures that were, indeed, included in the agreement.

As my honourable friend knows, and as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has acknowledged, there have been some changes in the economic circumstances, both with respect to supply and price in the international market, which, obviously, changed the cash flow both to the industry and to the governments involved. Of course, the modifications announced by the minister last night are to assist the industry.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development, by way of a supplementary, whether, in the judgment of the government, there is any relationship between the statement of Mr. Lalonde last night and the fact that the Canadian dollar closed today at 80.06 cents U.S.—a historic low?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Canadian dollar has been fluctuating somewhat.

Senator Murray: Not fluctuating—going down, down, down.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is not true.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should be careful about what he says because I can bring him some information to indicate that "fluctuating" is a far more accurate description than the one he is trying to give. There has been some decline. It may be that there have been some weeks where the declines have exceeded the increases.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there has been a very worrisome problem that the Minister of Finance and I have tried to explain from time to time, and that is that our costs and, indeed, our rate of inflation, which also has a direct effect on all of this, has not been backing off as rapidly as it has in the United States.

Senator Flynn: Hallelujah!

Senator Olson: At the same time, the Canadian dollar, relative to almost all the other currencies in the western world, has, indeed, strengthened in the past few months. In other words, it has not declined in relation to the American dollar as much as have many of the currencies of our competitors, particularly in Europe, and other places as well. These factors have to be taken into account.

Senator Asselin: Answer the question.

● (2010)

Senator Olson: I am answering the question.

Senator Asselin: No, you are not.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend says that I am not answering the question. I think he probably has already forgotten what the question was.

Senator Flynn: He certainly has.

Senator Murray: Does the minister not agree that if the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last evening had had the desired effect in terms of bolstering confidence in the policy of the Government of Canada, the Canadian dollar today would have firmed up, or its value would have increased vis-à-vis the American dollar, and, in any case, if the minister sees no relation between the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the historic weakness of the Canadian dollar, what, in the judgment of the government, is the reason for the current low state of the dollar?

Senator Olson: I thought I explained that just a moment ago. I am sorry my honourable friend was unable to pick that up, because to me it was well enunciated and crystal clear. There has been a significant difference in the rate of inflation and all of the factors that are dependent on that situation in terms of relations of one country to another. No one is trying to hide that, or anything like that. I have had to say that several times a week.

Senator Flynn: What do you say?

Senator Olson: It is a fact that that has happened, but if my honourable friend is asking what the minister's opinion is as to why the market responds to certain things, that is another question. If he wishes to draw a direct relationship between the announcement made last evening and the dollar going down less than a quarter of a percentage point today—

Senator Flynn: Oh, that's nothing, is it?

Senator Olson: —then I suppose we should have some explanation as to why it went up and down in a week when there were no announcements made. There are many factors that go into changing the value of the Canadian dollar relative to the United States dollar.

It could be that there was something less than anticipated. I believe that the announcement of an additional amount of some $2 billion to the cash flow of the industry over the time span which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources mentioned, is significant. I believe that that amount is significant. All the details can be spelled out. There is the annual credit of $250,000 to all oil companies, particularly small oil companies, with respect to the PGRT. Changes to other taxes were also mentioned in that statement.

To respond to the question as to whether they expected more, perhaps it could have had an influence, but there may have been other factors, in all of the complex dealings that lead up to the level at which the dollar is set from time to time, that might have had an even more important influence on the decline today.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question to ask the minister. Would my honourable friend explain why the rate of inflation in Canada remains significantly higher than the rate of inflation in the United States?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we would all like to know the answer to that question.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: Resign!

Senator Olson: I am sure that many of us would like to know why it is that the rate of inflation in Canada is higher. If it were, indeed, to decrease, not completely in parallel with that in the United States, but at least to a level somewhat lower than it is at now, it would ease many problems, including a wide range of things such as interest rates, and so forth, that are giving our economy so much difficulty.

● (2015)

Senator Balfour: I wonder if it ever occurred to my honourable friend that blowing several billion dollars and buying a chain of several thousand service stations might have some bearing on the situation?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is at liberty to think that if he wishes. I know, however, that the people of this country rendered a pretty firm point of view to my friends opposite when they were going to phase out Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: "Phase out"? There was never any question of phasing it out! We were going to do something like you are doing with CDC; that is different.

Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the minister if the announcement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last night was part of the revision of the overall economic policies of the government, which the minister told a journalist from Le Devoir last week would take place eventually.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, regarding the announcement that was made last night, I think that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was speaking for the energy sector of our industry. I do not believe he made any attempt to indicate that his statement encompassed anything larger than his anxiety that the industry should have a higher cash flow and could therefore raise its budgets for exploration, development and all of the things that they do.

Senator Flynn: It was only part of the revision, then. Can we expect other ministers to make similar announcements in their respective areas of responsibility in the coming weeks or months?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, announcements are made almost every week about certain changes.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again!

Senator Olson: There is nothing new about that. That is what an active and responsive government does all the time.

Senator Flynn: Responsive but not responsible!

Senator Olson: They respond to the real needs of the economic situation. The Minister of Employment and Immigration, for example, has made a number of announcements—

Senator Flynn: They react like a football; that is all!

Senator Balfour: It is no joking matter.

Senator Olson: That is right. That is why I would appreciate the Leader of the Opposition asking these questions seriously.

Senator Flynn: I certainly do—very seriously.

Senator Olson: I am saying that my honourable friend should not be surprised if he hears ministers make announcements from time to time with respect to the activities of their respective departments. There is nothing new about that.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the government to let the value of the dollar decrease to below 80 cents during the coming weeks?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance, who is the minister most directly responsible for responding to questions like that, indicated earlier today in the other place that he has a great deal of confidence in the Canadian dollar and in the economy that supports it.

Senator Asselin: What will the government now do to try to bring the dollar up to 80 cents?

Senator Olson: I am sorry, but I did not hear the question.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: A supplementary question. What does the government intend to do to shore up the Canadian dollar and keep it above 80 cents?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the dollar is above 80 cents right now.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question.

Senator Flynn: Bravo! Here is a voice in support.

Senator Bosa: Is the Minister of State for Economic Development aware that on its 6 o'clock memo the CBC reported that the French franc had declined 2 per cent against the United States dollar and that the German mark had declined 1 per cent against the same currency—

Senator Flynn: What about the Italian lira?

Senator Bosa: I do not know; they did not talk about it. I have a feeling that it held firm.

The Canadian dollar, however, was only devalued about a quarter of 1 per cent. Is the honourable minister aware of that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not aware of that, but I am not surprised that, if the opposition was aware of that, they would leave it out of their questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not really think there is any reason why we should be reluctant to inform my honourable friend about foreign currencies. I am sure, however, that he would be a bit reluctant to tell Governor Bouey about it, because if he finds out that somebody else has devalued their currency and still lives to tell the tale, he may have to re-think the government's own policy in connection with the value of money.

I really want to ask my honourable friend some questions about the reform of the National Energy Program which, in my opinion, does not go nearly far enough to do the job. Certainly, there is no favourable comparison with the action taken by the Government of Alberta. I want to ask my friend, in particular, to explain why two of the tax remissions—the petroleum and gas revenue tax and the incremental oil revenue tax—are altered or reduced for a period of one year only. Presumably, the idea is to improve the cash flow of the companies concerned. Does my honourable friend have an explanation as to why this one-year period is considered adequate? Does he think that at the end of that time the cash flow of these companies will have improved so much that this form of assistance will no longer be required?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend understands one other thing when he asks that kind of question, and that is that the announcement is to the effect that it is for one year. There will be a budget before that year expires, and there could even be more than one before June 1983. Certainly, if there are significant changes in a number of things, including the cash flow to the oil and gas sector, there could be some changes. Such changes are reserved for the Minister of Finance in any budget, but what we are suggesting now is that the $250,000 annual credit with respect to the PGRT is very important for a number of small companies that are now having some difficulty with that. The honourable senator is asking why it is not for a longer period. The Minister of Finance obviously needs to look at these things each time he is in the process of bringing forth a budget.

Senator Roblin: Of course, my honourable friend completely overlooks the point that what the oil industry is looking for from the government is some concrete demonstration that they can depend on. Confidence is one of the big things that is lacking. Here we have this tax reduction for one year. I ask you: Is it not probable that many people who might be disposed to invest in the oil industry, on account of a tax reduction, might be reluctant to do so if they feel that this is good for one year only? This goes to the very heart of part of our problem—uncertainty. The government changes its mind.

For example, take the poor people at Suncor—I do not know whether or not I should say “poor”, because the Government of Ontario thinks they are doing all right. They have had their royalties and the price of their oil jiggled up and down in the last two years in a scandalous fashion. Here we have them again, this time, being given a pat on the head instead of a pat on the bottom.

An Hon. Senator: Careful now!

Senator Roblin: A pat is all right. If it was something else it would be a little different, but I am only talking about “pats.” My honourable friend must surely recognize that this is not a satisfactory situation.

Senator Olson: As I said before, my honourable friend and others have the right to disagree. I happen to believe that $2 billion is quite a lot of money. That is the undertaking that is being given here. Again, my honourable friend overlooks the fact that effective July 1 the proposal is to raise the wellhead price for oil discovered after December 1, 1974, which moves it back, I believe, six years, to 75 per cent of the landed Montreal price. There are a number of other amendments, particularly on taxation and pricing, where changes in the rules and regulations do in fact extend longer than the year that my honourable friend is referring to. He can make all the arguments he likes that they probably would have appreciated a little more, which is normal, but $2 billion is not an insignificant amount.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that it is not an insignificant amount, but the only trouble is that it comes at this particular time under these particular circumstances when half of the damage has been done.

Senator Flynn: Too late!

Senator Roblin: Although I have them in my hand, I am not going to recite to my honourable friend the statistics as to what has happened to the oil industry since my honourable friend's colleagues decided to impose their interventionist policies on this thing, and to proceed with their tax grab, in such a counterproductive way, on the extra price that accrues to oil.

● (2025)

My honourable friend never seems to learn the lesson, which is simply this: Stop your revenue grab as the first item of business, and content yourself with collecting a tax on the profits of the industry. That is the proper way to do it. My honourable friend is indulging in half measures here, however. He realizes his policies are counterproductive; he realizes they have created enormous problems. He has looked at what the Province of Alberta has done, and has seen their clear recognition of the damage that has taken place in their desire to do something. Then he comes in with a program that is quite inadequate for the purpose, and some of the benefits of which are for 12 months only. That is not going to be enough to get the results my honourable friend wants to get.

NEW FINANCIAL STATEMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The Minister of Finance, before a committee of the other place, indicated that he would be introducing shortly a new financial statement. Can the minister tell us when that will occur, and if it will be any more accurate than the budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): My honourable friend has, as usual, put a slightly different interpretation on what the Minister of Finance said in the committee of the other place.

Senator Phillips: I want the right interpretation, now.

Senator Olson: Well, I want to quote to you directly from the committee proceedings. I do not think this has been published yet, but, anyway, this is from the notes taken by the reporter:

I think it is worth repeating that the amount of borrowing authority requested is based on the projection of financial requirements contained in the budget of last November, and it is well known to hon. members that since the budget of last November there has been a major slowing of the world economy, the dimensions of which were certainly not anticipated by me last fall, and I may add, not anticipated by very many others.

He continued as follows:

And I would therefore tell the committee that I would anticipate coming back to the House to request additional borrowing authority some time prior to the end of the fiscal year. But I would not expect the House to act upon an additional request for borrowing authority without providing it with detailed information on the economic situation and the implications of that situation on the government's fiscal situation. I do not think it would be appropriate to ask the House for additional borrowing authority until I have laid out in some detail an update of both the economic situation and the fiscal situation and I certainly will be doing that before I would come back to the House for additional borrowing authority.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for reading from the scriptures of the other place. Perhaps I should say “selected scriptures,” because I notice he did not say there was a slowing down of the Canadian economy. He referred to a slowing down of the world economy.

Senator Olson: Canada is a part of the world.

Senator Phillips: It is the Canadian economy we are particularly interested in, and sometimes I would appreciate it if the minister could bear to remember that.

I would like also to ask him if that statement would include assistance, or improvements, as he prefers to call them, for the manufacturing industries, the agricultural industries and the fisheries industries. I refer to improvements similar to those offered to the oil industry last night.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe the Minister of Finance gave a commitment as to what would be included in his update of the economic and financial situation with respect to the government, so the question is really quite apart from all of that. It may, and it may not, be in the statement. I can tell my honourable friend, however, that there may be a number of ministers who will be authorized by Cabinet, or even their own reference level budgets, to make announcements that would include improvements in the areas my honourable friend has just referred to.

Senator Phillips: We will look forward to it.

ENERGY

WESTERN ELECTRICAL GRID—PROPOSED CONTRIBUTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask my honourable friend, the Minister of State for Economic Development, who has been on his feet for the last few minutes, to give me an explanation of the statement that the government is giving serious consideration to making a financial contribution to the proposed western electrical grid.

First, when will that statement be made on the western electrical grid, and, second, will it cover not only the western grid in Canada but the export of hydro-electric power to customers in the United States, in the same way as the government intends to support nuclear-generated electricity being exported to the United States?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and will see if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is prepared to make a more precise statement about the dates requested by my honourable friend.

Senator Roblin: I should like my honourable friend to be so kind as to impress upon the minister the necessity for getting the policy statement in good time, because this whole question of the western grid and the export of power to the United States from western Canada, particularly my own province of Manitoba, is an active item on the provincial agenda these days. If Ottawa intends to do anything about it, it would be extremely helpful if we knew about it in good time.

Senator Olson: May I ask my honourable friend if he has seen the communiqué that was issued by the department? It does not provide great detail, but on the electricity options it says:

The NEP Update sets out a wide range of other possibilities to encourage the development of the full range of Canada's energy strength, including, for example, electricity generated from potential new nuclear power plants dedicated initially to export markets.

[Senator Phillips.]

The Government of Canada has also promised serious consideration of possible financial support for the proposed Western Grid electrical interconnection system. Emphasis is placed on continuing close co-operation with provincial governments to develop energy solutions tailored to regional needs.

I admit that it does not answer fully the question asked by my honourable friend. With regard to his request for a more precise time frame, and if it will be related to, or connected with, potential export sales, I will ensure that he receives a reply to that part of his question.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend read from the same information I have, but it does not answer my question in the slightest. I would appreciate some concise statement on the subject.

THE BUDGET

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government regarding future business. On Monday we had the latest in the series of budget announcements by newspaper press release in connection with depreciation rates to be allowed in the budget of last November. The release given yesterday represented another change, one of the many that have come to our attention by courtesy of the media. Is it the intention of the government, before the house rises for the summer recess, to bring down the legislative measures that are necessary to give final and definitive form to the budget proposals of last November?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know, but I will try to find out.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend realizes, of course, that the Canadian taxpaying public has been twisting in the wind now for about six months on this topic. It would confer a great favour, I am sure, on many people if the Deputy Leader of the Government could urge his colleagues to let us know what they really intend to do, because this business of having changes announced every second week through the press release is not a satisfactory reflection on parliamentary government or the competence of the administration.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I recognize that there are advantages and disadvantages in attempting to be responsive to representations made by those who are affected by budget measures. Honourable senators will recall that the Minister of Finance accepted that changes were necessary in the traditional process of budget-making, so that the disadvantages that occur from a budget, and the responses to suggestions made by those affected, can be avoided.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend not aware that the Minister of Finance proposed last year to refer, I believe, five subject areas to special committees of the House of Commons, where, in contradistinction to the usual procedure before Committee of the Whole, people could come and make their representations? Yet, so far as I am aware, not all of those committees have been called. I am not sure that any of them have been called. So how can we congratulate the government for responding to complaints that are made to them by the public when they have not proceeded so far as to set up those committees to allow a forum for discussion of these urgent matters?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not want to leave the impression that I am so naive as to think that we would be congratulated for anything. Perhaps I should not say that, because I do not think it is true. However, I did not wish to give the impression that I was expecting, inciting or begging for congratulations. I was simply placing on the record the fact that some of the concerns expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition are shared by the government, with reference to the whole traditional process of budget-making and budget changes in response to representations made. None of that will change my original answer, which is that I will try to find out what the legislative plans are with respect to any changes announced regarding the November 12 budget.

Senator Roblin: I search the press daily to find some reason to congratulate the government, but so far without result. I cannot find a good word in the press—not one.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—GENERAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: My question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development and concerns the general development agreement for Quebec now in effect. The agreement was signed in 1974 for a period of ten years and will expire on March 31, 1984. My question is as follows: Does the government intend to renew the agreement?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to give a definitive answer today, in 1982, to what the government would be considering prior to the expiry of that agreement in 1984. We have many matters to consider, and at this time we have not considered what we may be doing in an extension, modification, or whatever, of that agreement that is some two years down the road.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. Last week, the minister corrected me when I stated that, from certain comments by the Prime Minister, I had understood that the agreement would not be renewed. In his answer the minister said that I had misunderstood and that if I had read certain paragraphs of the paper tabled in January, I would have realized that the agreement would be replaced by other less complex agreements. In any case, whether it is going to be replaced by less complex agreements or in some other fashion, my question is, specifically: Will the general agreement be renewed or not? If not, will there be other agreements.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the question, however much the preamble to it was changed, is essentially different from the first question asked by the honourable senator. The reply that I gave to his first question is equally applicable to the second one.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: If I understood the answer to the first question correctly, it would be premature, two years before the renewal date, namely March 31, 1984, to answer whether or not the government intends to renew. I do not see any contradiction between my second question and the answer I got to the first one, as far as the wording of my second question is concerned. In his statement last week, when I said that there would probably be no renewal, the minister corrected me and said that a series of different agreements would be substituted. So my question is, in any case, concerned with the fact whether or not the present agreement will be renewed. Now, to complete my second question, if the agreement is not renewed, will it be replaced by an equivalent agreement?

● (2040)

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall give my reply in slightly different words, but it will not be very different and that is that the General Development Agreement, which was signed in 1974 for a ten-year period, has not been considered by the government in respect of what will be in that agreement beyond 1984, whether it will be the same agreement, a modified one or an entirely different one. My honourable friend knows as well as I do that the Prime Minister indicated in the January 12 announcement and, indeed, in some speeches since that time, that there will be some modification, particularly to some of the agreements which are commonly known as sub-agreements under the General Development Agreement, with respect to this subject, and that these subagreements would be put in somewhat simpler terms.

So, in some cases at least, perhaps in most cases, the government will be seeking arrangements where there is less of the type of agreements where both governments have to agree to a percentage of the spending, and so on. Certainly, we are interested in economic development in Quebec as well as in the other provinces, even though we may have somewhat less complicated and, therefore, simpler agreements to achieve what is necessary. We hope that such agreements will add to the efficiency of the delivery system and, perhaps, in many cases shorten some of the time delays that are involved in negotiating subsidiary agreements under the GDA.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, the minister has only talked about the auxilliary agreements or the specific agreements. Again, I repeat, is it the intention of the government to renew the general agreement with the provinces, or does it intend to replace those general agreements with something else and, if so, what is the "something else?" These general agreements spell out the objectives for economic development of the region or the province, in this case the province of Quebec. I would like to illustrate the kind of problem that could be created if those agreements are not renewed.

In the case of Quebec the first objective is to stimulate the creation of productive jobs and to consolidate jobs in the traditional sectors. If we do not renew the general agreement—and I underline the word “general”—would it mean that the government is intending to change the objectives of the General Development Agreement, including that objective? In other words, would that first objective become the third objective or the sixth objective?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am trying to be as informative as I can, but the honourable senator is asking me whether we are going to renew an agreement that does not expire until March 31, 1984, and if we are not going to renew the agreement, then what are we going to substitute for it, and so on. I tried to indicate some time ago that the government has not made a decision on whether it will renew, modify, or substitute something for the agreement in its present form. But I would expect that several weeks, perhaps even a few months, before the expiry of the GDA there will be some more focussed attention given to it and, no doubt, shortly before the expiry of the agreement they will make an announcement of what the arrangements will be post March 31, 1984.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I do not have a supplementary question but, with your permission, I would like to make a comment. I shall reread the answer the minister gave me last week to make sure that I do not make a mistake, but I believe that last week he answered that the agreements will not be renewed but replaced by simpler ones.

Senator Olson: I do not think there is any question about that. This matter was also contained in the statement made by the Prime Minister on January 12. You can take certain sections, certain parts of sentences or phrases and arrive at what I think is probably a distorted interpretation of what is involved in the agreement, but the objective to have simpler agreements with the provinces is clear and has been stated unequivocally.

DOME PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a very brief question. On Wednesday, May 26, I asked the Minister of State for Economic Development whether Dome Petroleum Ltd. had approached, either formally or informally, the federal government with regard to their financial problems. I received a satisfactory answer from the minister indicating that no informal or formal approach had been made, but the minister excepted from his answer any junior officials or other officials who might have made some contact of which he had no knowledge.

A newspaper account of the matter on the following day, May 27, said that earlier in the month Dome executives had met with the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, to discuss the situation. I do not wish to go any further than that, but that statement is directly related to the financial problems. I wonder if the minister would confirm for us whether Dome has indeed met with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am sure that in the response the minister gave me last week he was not including Mr. Lalonde as an official.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Oh, no.

Senator Nurgitz: First, would the minister confirm if such meetings took place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, as I did last week, and ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he has had any meetings with senior officers of Dome Petroleum Ltd., but I am not sure if I can give an undertaking that I am prepared to come back with an answer or even ask him for an answer revealing the detailed contents of whatever conversation they might have had.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I only asked if the approach was made. I did not get into the specific questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We will, though.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Does the government have before it, in light of last night's announcement by Mr. Lalonde, in any form, the particular problems of Dome, or is it the position of the government that last night's announcement solves the Dome problem?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have to be a little bit careful now because Senator Murray is doing what he has tried very cleverly to do on many occasions, and that is to get me to respond to some degree with respect to what may or may not be on the agenda of cabinet meetings, and I am not going to do that.

Senator Murray: With respect, I was asking the minister whether the government had before it in any form—and it may not necessarily be before a meeting of cabinet, but before the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, his ministry, the Department of Finance or before a committee of the government, to name a number of places where the subject might be under consideration—the matter of the particular problems concerning Dome. Surely the minister is in a position to answer the question that I put to him?

Is it the position of the government that last night's announcement has solved the Dome problem, or does the government have that problem under any form of consideration?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it should not be assumed that last night's announcement, by itself, completely solved any oil company's problem, including Dome Petroleum's, if it has one.

I am sure my honourable friend will find the remainder of the answer that he is seeking in the reply I will obtain for Senator Nurgitz.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on May 12 by Senator Charbonneau concerning government policy to encourage the creation of new jobs in the construction industry.

It is a long answer covering federal government housing initiatives which will culminate in the creation of 120,000 potential direct and indirect jobs. If honourable senators prefer, I may file the delayed answer with the Hansard reporter in order that it may be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Finance announced on November 12 that the government would provide interest-free loans of up to $7,500 per unit under the Canada Rental Supply Plan (CRSP) to assist the construction of 15,000 rental units in areas where vacancy rates are very low. On March 23 the Honourable Paul Cosgrove announced an increase in the number of rental units that would be provided under this plan to 30,000 units. These 30,000 new rental units will create an estimated 60,000 new jobs in Canadian communities.

Also announced on March 23 was the Canada Home Renovation Plan (CHRP) which is aimed at creating jobs by encouraging people to hire labour to fix up their houses. The plan is targetted to areas of the country experiencing high unemployment. Homeowners with total household incomes of $30,000 are eligible for 30 per cent, to a maximum of $3,000, of the renovation costs. The assistance available to households with incomes between $30,000 and the maximum of $48,000 is reduced by 5 per cent for every $1,000 of income over $30,000. Under the plan, a minimum of one-third of a homeowner's total cost must be spent on contracted labour. With this stipulation and a budget of $30 million, the government anticipates the scheme will directly and indirectly create 10,000 jobs. The plan went into operation in May of this year.

On March 23 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced changes in the eligibility date for homes under the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP). The eligibility date in most provinces was extended from January 1, 1961 to January 1, 1971. An additional 20,000 jobs are expected to be generated as a result of this change.

In addition to the most recent announcements, the federal government supports rental construction for low and moderate-income families and individuals under the Non-Profit Co-operative Housing Programs. It is estimated that the new construction only under these two programs will provide 30,000 jobs in 1982.

These commitments will bring to 120,000 the potential number of direct and indirect jobs created by federal government housing initiatives.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senators Smith and Bosa relating to trade with Japan, with particular reference to car imports.

This delayed answer is also rather long and, if honourable senators agree, I will file it with the Hansard reporter as though it had been read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

I am informed that even though the final import figures for Japanese passenger automobiles are not yet available we estimate a figure in the range of 190,000 cars (179,045 excluding March 1982). Import figures differ from export figures because of a time delay in shipment and entry into Canada; the Japanese did respect their voluntary export restraint of 174,123 units for fiscal year 1981-1982.

Those imports represented 24.3 per cent of the total 1981-1982 fiscal year car sales. In F/Y 1978-1979 Japanese imported car sales represented 10.3 per cent of the total Canadian car market.

It is very difficult, on a hypothetical basis, to estimate the number of jobs that would have been created if the levels of cars imported would have remained at their fiscal year 1978-1979 levels.

It is not sufficient to draw a direct line between "jobs lost" and "cars produced" because consumer requirements changed substantially and the North American automotive industry did not convert to meet these changes. Furthermore the entire car sales market continues to be depressed due to a downturn in the international economy.

The balance of trade was in Canada's favour by some $400 million in calendar year 1981. (Canadian exports to Japan were $4.49 billion and imports from Japan were $4.04 billion).

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—MARITIME COMMAND—AMMUNITION SUPPLIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on May 13.

The answer is not long, but perhaps Senator Charbonneau would prefer to study the answer in print. It deals with ammunition supply to Maritime Command.

If honourable senators agree, it could be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

A news item which originated in Halifax on May 11, stating that the Canadian warships may have to stop using their guns this summer because they are almost out of training ammunition and that they may have to dip into war supplies is incorrect.

In fact, there is sufficient practice ammunition at current usage rates within the Forces training schedule to last well into the fall of this year. Practice ammunition is routinely transferred between Canadian Forces ammunition magazines, supply ships and operational ships. Thus, levels in magazines fluctuate on a daily basis and are not indicative of actual holdings. Further, it should be noted that Maritime Command maintains a full complement of NATO wartime stocks.

In the past two years there has been a change in the procurement procedures which has resulted in an initial slowdown of delivery of ammunition as the change over is being made. 3"50 training ammunition has been purchased offshore because of the lack of a Canadian manufacturer. Purchases were made when a manufacturer could supply and were normally in quantities which would last three to five years. A decision was made approximately two years ago to produce ammunition in Canada in an attempt to give Canadian contracts to Canadian companies and thereby create jobs for Canadians. In this regard, a source has now been developed in Canada, a contract let and the first delivery of ammunition is expected from Canadian Arsenals Ltd. of Montreal this fall.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Guay on May 19 concerning the Garrison diversion project.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is not here.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Frith: Perhaps this delayed answer could also be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On May 18, a U.S. federal judge in South Dakota issued a preliminary injunction against further Garrison construction. This injunction replaces a temporary restraining order which has stopped construction since April 29. The injunction will halt plans to build the West Oakes pumping plant, a contract for which was awarded on March 29.

The injunction will remain in force at least until the judge's decision, expected in June, on the suit by the James River Flood Control Committee. This South Dakota group wants a ban on further Garrison development until additional studies are conducted on the risk of downstream damage.

The federal and Manitoba governments have agreed in principle to send a delegation on federal and provincial legislators to Washington to express Canada's concerns on the Garrison issue. The timing of such a visit is obviously an important consideration and will be contingent on developments in the U.S. Congress, in particular the upcoming debate on additional financial appropriations for Garrison.

QUEBEC

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS—PROTECTION OF MINORITY

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before the conclusion of Question Period, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if the government has any plans to take steps to give the protection of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which we proclaimed so proudly here a few weeks ago, to the minority of over 1 million in the province of Quebec. At the moment they are in a state of complete uncertainty because of the bill now before the Quebec legislature.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that the government intends to do everything within its power to support the provisions of the new Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I will attempt to bring more detailed information to the chamber relating to the particular subject raised by Senator Molson.

FINANCE

PROVINCIAL BORROWING

Question No. 74 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Peter Bosa:

1. Have provincial governments borrowed any funds outside Canada during the fiscal years 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 and, if so, (i) how much (ii) at what rate, and (iii) what was the repayment period?

2. What is the impact of such borrowings on the (i) balance of payments (ii) the exchange rate and (iii) the money supply?

3. If the same funds had been borrowed from the Bank of Canada under the same conditions, what impact would it have had on (i) the balance of payments (ii) the exchange rate, and (iii) the money supply and what would have been the overall impact on the Canadian economy?

Reply by the Minister of State (Finance):

1. (i) Net issues of direct and guaranteed bonds in foreign markets by the provinces totalled $913 million in 1979-80, $433 million in 1980-81 and $5,203 million in the first three quarters of the 1981-82 fiscal year. The provincial governments also borrowed in the form of bank loans and short-term paper, but the breakdown between Canadian and foreign markets is not available in official publications.

(ii) In view of the importance of American markets in the total borrowings in foreign markets, the average cost of these borrowings may be estimated from the American rate on comparable securities. The average interest rate was 11.20 per cent in 1979-80, 13.50 per cent in 1980-81 and 16.65 per cent in the first three quarters of 1981-82.

(iii) The maturity of the securities issued in foreign markets generally varies between 5 and 30 years.

2. (i) The short-term impact of these borrowings on the balance of payments is an equivalent inflow of capital into Canada. However, interest payments represent outflows from the services account. Furthermore, when the securities mature, the capital account will be debited by an amount equivalent to the principal originally borrowed.

(ii) At the time of the borrowing, there is upward pressure on the exchange rate, which is offset later when the securities are redeemed. On the other hand, there is some downward pressure on the exchange rate engendered by the outflow of interest payments.

(iii) These borrowings abroad should not have a direct bearing on the money supply, since the Bank of Canada can continue to control it, given a flexible exchange rate system.

3. The provincial governments cannot borrow directly from the Bank of Canada. However, the Bank can purchase securities issued by the provincial governments although, in practice, it has never done so. Administration of the monetary policy demands that control of the money supply in the country involves co-ordination with the issue of securities by the federal government.

If the provincial governments had decided to borrow this money on domestic markets, there would not have been a direct impact on the balance of payments, the exchange rate and the money supply. The total impact of such borrowings on the Canadian economy would primarily depend on the use of the funds. The immediate impact of additional borrowings on the Canadian markets would be upward pressure on corresponding interest rates.

PRIVATE BILL

E.G. KLEIN LIMITED—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Third reading of the Bill S-26, intituled: "An Act to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act". (Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Leblanc, I move—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Until tomorrow!

Senator Frith: All right, but Senator Leblanc will not be here tomorrow.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I will have a look at the proceedings of the committee. I will probably have something to say on third reading, but I do not know whether it will be tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the order stand until tomorrow.

Order stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-114, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

He said: Honourable senators, the object of Bill C-114 is to extend the variable entrance requirement, the VER, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, for a period of 12 months—that is, from June 4, 1982, which is Friday of this week, until June 3, 1983.

In 1977, the entrance requirements were what were called "fixed" entrance requirements. The variable entrance requirement, established in 1977, was an attempt to tailor the varying unemployment rates across the country to entrance requirements. In other words, because unemployment insurance requirements varied from coast to coast, it was felt that the entrance requirements, which were then fixed, should be adjusted to meet the varying unemployment rates. Therefore, in 1977, the variable entrance requirement was established. It expires on June 4, 1982.

The Unemployment Insurance Act review task force has studied the Unemployment Insurance Act. The intention of this bill is, simply, to continue the present situation, namely, the variable entrance requirements that are tied to varying unemployment rates for a period of one year in order to give Parliament, as well as other organizations and individuals most directly affected, sufficient time to reasonably discuss the proposed changes to the VER and other provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act stemming from the Unemployment Insurance Act review task force's recommendations.

Honourable senators, there is some urgency with respect to this bill. The present formula appears to have the support of the people and, for the present at least, the support of all parties in Parliament. It would be somewhat awkward if we reverted to the fixed requirement before having had an opportunity to make a more detailed study as to what should replace the VER which is, more or less, working satisfactorily.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I notice that the amendment provides that it be subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament. Is it intended to send this to a committee, because my recollection is, although there is a provision for an affirmative resolution under the Interpretation Act, no rules have ever actually been adopted by either the House of Commons or the Senate, and there may be some technical difficulties.

In view of the fact that we went through the process in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with respect to negative resolutions to determine that they were in order, possibly this should be looked at from a technical point of view to make sure that the House of Commons does have the power, and that it can, indeed, pass an affirmative resolution with no more than appears here.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would raise another point that is of interest, and it concerns the question of financing these arrangements.

An announcement was made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration the other day to the effect that $350 million was being appropriated from the Unemployment Insurance Fund in order to finance some of his operations in connection with spreading employment and the like. It seems obvious as well that this bill will give rise to a further drain on the Unemployment Insurance Fund.

On a previous occasion I asked the gentleman on the other side to tell me the policy of the government with respect to Mr. Axworthy's draw of $350 million on the fund; whether it was the intention of the government to finance that in the regular unemployment insurance fashion, partly from the workers and partly from the employers, or to finance it from the general revenue.

Before concluding the debate on this subject I would appreciate some statement from the government on those two points. First of all, how will the government finance the current draws Mr. Axworthy has mentioned in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Fund, and, secondly, what is the anticipated cost of this new measure?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are two parts to Senator Roblin's question.

To the general question, which he pointed out he asked some weeks ago, I am sorry to say that I do not have an answer. However, I will renew my efforts to obtain an answer for him.

As to the costs of this current bill, I did anticipate a question on that subject and out of my own curiosity asked for information on it. I was advised that it is not possible to determine now with any exactness what that figure will be. That will depend on unemployment rates between now and the end of the year, so I cannot give an exact figure. I shall try to obtain the answer.

I would hope, honourable senators, that because we are continuing with the current arrangement, an answer to the more general question asked earlier would not be made a condition to giving second and third reading to this bill this week.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Why did we get the bill so late?

Senator Roblin: If I might answer the concern expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Government, I have no intention of holding the bill up on that account, but I should like to know the answer because I am engaged in an ongoing discussion with the Leader of the Government with regard to the budget, how much it amounts to, what is in it and what is not in it. He and I have had a difference of opinion on that because I do not think one can apply the general certificate an accountant is inclined to place on a balance sheet, certifying that balance sheet to the effect that it is consistent with that of the former year. I think you will find that we have a problem here, so I am interested to know ultimately what happens to the $350 million.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as a matter of fact, I believe I was the acting leader on the occasion Senator Roblin asked the question. I shall renew my request for information on the $350 million.

With respect to Senator Godfrey's observations regarding the negative resolution and the—Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The affirmative resolution.

Senator Frith: The affirmative and negative resolutions—and the connection between that and other bills before the Senate, and the other suggestions made by members of the Senate, I shall have them drawn to the attention of the minister so that they can be studied and tied together. However, I do not think anything can be done about it by the end of this week.

Senator Godfrey: My only concern is to ensure that it is in order and that it will accomplish its purpose. I am not trying to hold up the bill.

On motion of Senator Muir, debate adjourned.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-105, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of this bill I do not believe I can use the expression often used in the Senate to the effect that a bill is either "complex" or "not complex," for the unusual reason that this bill is short and its purpose is clear.

The powers in the bill are simple and are simply expressed. There are only two of them.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is something rare.

Senator McIlraith: The language used to describe these powers is complex. The clauses of the bill are themselves complex because they relate to amending a complex act, so, I will not use a general term in attempting to describe the bill.

Perhaps this is one of those bills that should be referred to committee because the clauses, by the nature of their language and the nature of the act they amend, are complex. What the bill does, however, is fairly simple and direct.

First, it provides that a corporation may place constraints on the ownership of new classes of shares, or new shares, and, of course, provides for notice and all the other related matters.

Secondly, it provides that a corporation may acquire and hold its own shares.

Those are the two powers that are provided in the bill, and they can only be exercised in one circumstance. I think the best way I can put that forward is by reading part of clause 2 of the bill. It states:

—a corporation may, for the purpose of assisting the corporation or any of its affiliates or associates to qualify under any prescribed law of Canada or a province to receive licences, permits, grants, payments or other benefits by reason of attaining or maintaining a specified level of Canadian ownership or control, hold shares in itself—

That limitation appears throughout the bill.

There are two main instances where one might expect those powers to be used. One is in relation to Bill C-104, which relates to petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership. The other is in relation to the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which provides, in essence, that licences for exploration be granted in Canada lands only to those companies having 50 per cent Canadian ownership. That is really what the bill does.

It contains quite extensive clauses, to ensure that when a company acquires its own shares it only holds them for two years. If they are held for two years and no action is taken with respect to them, they fall back on the existing law which, in essence, means that they are cancelled. That was provided in the Canada business corporations legislation of 1974 or 1975.

Penalties are provided for companies not following the provisions of the bill. These penalties apply to the directors as well, when they knowingly fail to operate within the limits of the provisions of the bill in acquiring their own shares.

I should point out that the ability to place constraints upon shares only applies to new shares or new classes of shares being issued. There may be some confusion on that point, because the original Bill C-94, which dealt with the whole subject of energy policy, did have in it a somewhat different clause which really appeared to be retroactive, to that effect, in that constraints could be placed on shares that were already in existence. That provision is not contained in this bill. It was omitted before this bill was presented to the other place for first reading.

Honourable senators, the bill, as you will see, is aimed squarely at assisting those companies which wish to carry out the Canadianization program by giving them the power and authority to do so.

I do not believe there is anything further I can usefully add.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Might I ask the honourable senator a question? I hope he can answer it in one sentence. Why is this bill necessary?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is necessary because the companies that might desire to bring themselves within the provisions of what I may call the Canadianization parts of the energy program did not have the necessary power and authority to do so. These two small powers which are given to such companies by this bill will better enable them to fulfil that objective, if they so wish.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

ENERGY MONITORING BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-106, respecting energy monitoring and to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on second reading of Bill C-106, respecting energy monitoring and to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act.

I would like to summarize the legislation contained in Bill C-106. The Energy Monitoring Act gives the Petroleum Monitoring Agency the authority to collect data required to prepare reports on the oil and gas sector. A broad data collection authority is provided in the act so that the Government of Canada and Canadians generally can have a comprehensive overview of the activities and financial performance of the petroleum industry in Canada.

The regular monitoring surveys published by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency are an important component of the information required for Canadians generally to assess the effectiveness of government policies for the management of Canada's energy supplies and resources. For example, the monitoring surveys will indicate the amounts of capital expenditures being undertaken by the petroleum industry for exploration and development activities and the amount of government Petroleum Incentive Program grants associated with those expenditures. Thus, Canadians will be able to assess the large public investments being made to ensure Canada's energy future. Similarly, the regular monitoring surveys indicate the level of Canadian ownership and control of the petroleum industry in Canada. This will allow Canadians to judge the rate of progress towards the Canadianization objectives for the industry as outlined in the National Energy Program.

I think, honourable senators, that the purpose of the Energy Monitoring Act is clear. The energy sector, and particularly the oil and gas industry, is of vital importance to the country's economy. Therefore, it is essential that all concerned—Parliament, the public, the industry, as well as government—have available timely and comprehensive information of a factual nature to permit an evaluation of the effectiveness of the various initiatives within the National Energy Program on an ongoing basis. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency, by providing independent comment on data and information collected under the authority of the Energy Monitoring Act, will allow Canadians to judge for themselves the effectiveness of the government energy policies.

The government is anxious to minimize the reporting burden faced by the industry. In this connection, I would make two comments. First, only those enterprises with over $10 million in gross revenues or $10 million in assets must report. This relieves smaller companies of the administrative burden of completing questionnaires. The legislation has a provision which would permit the reporting threshold to be raised in the future. Second, a significant part of the data required under the act that relates to research and development activities, international flow of funds, and ownership and control, is being provided, with the permission of reporting companies, by Statistics Canada. Accordingly, these data requirements do not represent an increase in reporting requirements.

The Energy Monitoring Act contains provisions to extend, at some future date, monitoring activities to encompass coal, thorium and uranium, or any of these, should this prove necessary in the national interest. In its various states, coal is expected to become increasingly important as an energy commodity so that information about the industry's costs of production, profitability, ownership structure and reinvestment behaviour may become necessary for public policy purposes. Uranium and thorium, of course, are important inputs in the production of nuclear energy. At the present time, there does not appear to be a need to expand the legislation to include any of these fuels. Nevertheless, future developments may warrant such action being taken, and we would be short-sighted indeed if we did all of the work we are doing to increase Canadian ownership and control in the petroleum industry but ignored those factors in other resource areas which some day could be equally important.

This bill was the subject of a thorough and extensive examination by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Energy Legislation. As a result of the committee discussions, a number of amendments to Bill C-106 were recommended.

First, with respect to the Energy Monitoring Act, the committee recommended the addition of a clause, clause 42, which would have the effect of referring this act back to Parliament for consideration five years after the coming into force of the act. This clause is identical to one which was contained in the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act, 1978. I feel confident that honourable senators will agree with me that the reference back to Parliament is a desirable addition to the act. The committee also recommended a second amendment to correct an error that appeared in clause 38 of the bill.

I now turn to the proposed amendments to the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. The act provides for the allocation of petroleum products during an emergency that disrupts energy supplies. The Energy Supplies Allocation Board was established under the act to administer such an energy security program, if it is ever needed. Plans were prepared and regulations drafted in consultation with the provinces and the petroleum industry, and these are held ready should the board be required to implement them. The draft regulations were made public in November 1980.

During the preparation of the regulations, it became evident to the board that a small number of amendments to the act were required to permit the effective administration of the program. Most of these are of a housekeeping nature, but are important nonetheless. They include a broadening of the definition of "wholesale customer," an increase in the board's authority to delegate its workload, and other changes to help the board react efficiently to its mandate.

Some questions were asked at the committee stage as to whether, in working out an allocation program, the Energy Supplies Allocation Board might not be prone to some unintentional bias as a result of the background of members of the board. I believe that these concerns were answered completely by the chairman of the board, Mr. Harry Stevenson, who gave evidence as to his own background as well as that of other members of the board.

It was also pointed out to the Standing Committee on Energy Legislation that the allocation priorities developed by the board fall into three categories. First in priority are those uses of oil that are necessary for the health and welfare of the country, and included in that group are fire departments, police departments, the armed services and the production of food in agriculture. In the second category are those uses of oil that relate to the economy of the country, and they include almost all commercial and industrial businesses. The third category, and third in priority, relates to our standard of living, and includes retail stations, heating of public buildings and the recreational use of petroleum.

I feel that the Energy Supplies Allocation Board has done, and is continuing to do, an excellent job. It has worked with industry, essentially on a voluntary basis, and has benefited from the tremendous co-operation received by the various sectors of industry and other groups in Canada. As a result, if we are faced with a supplies emergency in the future, I am confident that that emergency will be dealt with as quickly and as fairly as advance planning can make possible.

The final group of proposed amendments contained in Bill C-106 relate to amendments to the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act. One of the main purposes of these amendments is to ensure that sufficient parliamentary authority exists for the government to use the market development incentive payments, which the Province of Alberta has agreed to pay under the September 1, 1981 and November 1981 agreements. These payments may generally be used for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the expansion of markets east of Alberta for Alberta-produced gas.

At the same time, the proposed amendments will ensure that similar incentives may be offered, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, to gas distributors in British Columbia and to encourage and assist other types of oil substitution measures across Canada.

The amendments will serve to maintain and increase the momentum which has been achieved to date by our "off oil" programs. There has been a reduction of some 7 per cent in oil consumption in Canada in the last year. Part of this, of course, is due to economic circumstances, but a good part of it—we estimate about two-thirds—is due to conservation and substitution. Although the exact figures have not been refined as yet, a good estimate is that about 5 million barrels of oil were displaced in the first year of the Canada Oil Substitution Program. This would lead us to conclude that we have an extremely cost-effective oil displacement program even in the first year. The benefits of the program, of course, will continue year after year, and the proposed amendments to the act will enable us to expand this very important element in our goal of energy self-sufficiency.

On motion of Senator Donahoe, debate adjourned.

PETRO-CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-101, to amend the Petro-Canada Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to introduce for second reading Bill C-101, to amend the Petro-Canada Act. This bill, as honourable senators may know, is one of the important elements of the Government of Canada's National Energy Program. During the 1980 election, the Liberal Party promised to strengthen and expand Petro-Canada as an instrument of energy policy. That promise was formally repeated in the Speech from the Throne. The importance of Petro-Canada was mentioned as well in the National Energy Program. The provisions of Bill C-101 will give effect to this promise.

I recognize that this introduction will not automatically, or necessarily, commend the bill to certain honourable senators. On the other hand, these are the facts and they should be stated. I commend the bill, however, on the basis of what it will achieve.

To begin with, there are a number of amendments that are non-controversial. They are for purposes of consolidation and clarification—housekeeping amendments. For example, there are changes to provide for the payment of the directors of the corporation for duties undertaken in addition to attending meetings. Another provision is for the payment to Petro-Canada of money it lent for the Cold Lake project.

In addition, however, there are three amendments which do express significant initiatives. The first is an amendment to expand the authorized common share capital of Petro-Canada. The second is an amendment to permit the allocation of start-up funds for Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation. The third—and here I have to confess to a particular interest, if not a personal financial one—is an amendment to provide for the payment of moneys to fund a new subsidiary called Canertech. My particular interest is that this corporation will be based in my home province of Manitoba.

Dealing with the first amendment, the total additional capital provided by this bill for the corporation will be $4.9 billion. The new capital ceiling authorized by the bill is $5.5 billion, but because $500 million has been subscribed under the present legislation, and since a further $100 million has been provided with respect to the interest in PanArctic Oils, the total of new capital funds available is $4.9 billion. While that amount is a large sum, $4.9 billion is a small share of the roughly $300 billion which will be spent in Canada on energy projects in this decade alone.

To understand the need for this expanded capitalization, one has to understand the nature and the purpose of Petro-Canada's growth and developing responsibilities.

Petro-Canada is an important element of the NEP, because it allows all Canadians, through their national company, an opportunity to participate directly in and benefit from the development of our vast energy resources. Through its activities, Petro-Canada continues to play an important role in contributing to the process of Canadianization.

The crown corporation was created in 1975 because the government saw the need for a publicly owned national oil company, with interests in all major aspects of the industry, to act as an instrument of public energy policy. Petro-Canada quickly became a major oil and natural gas producer. In 1976 it purchased Atlantic Richfield (Canada) Limited, gaining thereby both developed and undeveloped oil and gas interests in western Canada and the frontier regions, as well as oil and sand leases.

Petro-Canada broadened its activity in the petroleum industry with the purchase of Pacific Petroleum in 1979. Canadians then owned 366 service stations and 54 wholesale outlets west of the Great Lakes. At this point there was a rather obvious imbalance in Petro-Canada's development: an almost complete absence from central and eastern Canada. This was rectified in 1981 when the crown corporation bought Petrofina, adding 1,000 service stations in central and eastern Canada; and, as well, a refinery in Montreal and, more important still, increased involvement in Alberta oilsands projects and reserves totalling 7.5 billion cubic meters of conventional oil and more than 19.8 billion cubic meters of natural gas in western Canada. Now Canadians can buy at Petro-Canada outlets almost anywhere in Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At the same price!

Senator Molgat: It is now the only fully Canadian-owned, fully integrated oil company in Canada. It has been particularly aggressive in exploring in the frontier region and encouraging other Canadian companies to do likewise. About 35 per cent of its corporate spending, and 60 per cent of its exploration, goes into the frontiers. Since 1976 Petro-Canada has been a prime mover behind 76 of the 128 wells drilled in the frontier. It is currently the only large Canadian landowner in the eastern offshore, the only Canadian operator there, and a participant in every major offshore well.

In 1981 Petro-Canada participated in more than 5 per cent of all the exploratory and development wells in Canada. This included the drilling of over 230 oil and gas wells in western Canada, as well as participation in 15 out of the 22 wells drilled in the frontier Canada lands.

I understand, honourable senators, that the company's success rate on exploratory wells is 70 per cent, even higher than the industry average. Although its spending in frontier regions is not expected to yield significant amounts of revenue until the latter part of this decade, Petro-Canada is facing the high risks of these frontier investments, knowing that when the time comes it will have the experience and talent, to the benefit of all Canadians, to develop the huge oil and gas reserves.

Honourable senators, I think the record speaks for itself. More often than not, Petro-Canada has been a leader in getting important projects off the ground, particularly in the frontier regions. However, I want to reiterate a commitment that has been made emphatically by the government in the past. There is no intention, on this government's part, that the public presence will overwhelm the private sector component of the oil and gas industry. This industry is, and will remain, largely in private hands. In fact, a good deal of the National Energy Program is designed to create a favourable policy and investment environment that will ensure that a healthy private sector can play its role in securing Canada's energy future.

If public opinion polls are accurate, the Canadian public heartily endorses the expenditures related to Petro-Canada. It has done an effective job, by itself and in partnership with others. Many of its projects, undertaken in the national interest, call for huge investment with a pay-off far in the future. It needs the financial means to do this job.

The second amendment of importance is included in order to meet Canada's commitment to help less fortunate countries, particularly in the energy field, in order to reduce or to eliminate their dependence on imported oil. This bill contains amendments in order to provide for up to $60 million of the $250 million that has been allocated to Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation for the four-year period ending 1984-85. This subsidiary of Petro-Canada is to provide various forms of assistance to developing countries, including, for instance, participation in oil and gas exploration in these countries, studies on oil and gas exploration, and technical assistance and training in the exploration, development and production of oil and gas.

Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation may be a world "first." There have been a number of bilateral agreements for petroleum development assistance and technology transfer, but it probably represents the first permanent agency to provide development assistance. It is an exciting idea that has been well received by the countries of the Third World and by international assistance agencies.

In the nine years since the international oil price began to climb, severe adjustment problems have not been confined to the developed countries with high energy costs. These problems have also occurred in the middle-income countries where opportunities for economic development were often based on the increased use of imported oil. These middle-income countries, often dependent upon the export of a few commodities or manufacturers for their foreign exchange, have found it difficult to cope with the tenfold increase in the price of oil. The repercussions have been severe.

For the poorest countries of the world the increasing price of oil has made the possibility of economic development even more remote. It has become almost impossible for developing nations to pay for their oil imports, even though the quantity of oil imported is extremely small. In addition, there is a fuel wood crisis in many of the poorest countries. It threatens reserves of woodlands and causes irreparable ecological damage by erosion. Ten years ago there was hope that cheap petroleum products could be substituted for fuel wood in these subsistence economies, but that hope has disappeared.

What are the answers for these countries? Many of the answers are the same as those we have heard for Canada: increased use of solar energy, hydro electricity, and electricity from uranium and coal. Some countries of the Third World have these energy sources and are able to use them, but they usually require massive investment and long lead times. The countries of the Third World are not well equipped to undertake these developments. They cannot finance them and, even if they could, they have few immediate energy sources, while waiting for long term projects to be completed. For example, the Saudi Arabians tell us that they have found that it is cheaper to install solar equipment in some of their communities than it is to truck in the equivalent amount of energy in the form of oil. They are purchasing solar equipment, but if they did not have the oil they would be hard pressed to find the foreign exchange with which to buy these solar devices. As many as 100 countries of the world are in the position of Saudi Arabia, but they do not have the giant oil fields.

It is likely that some of these countries have undiscovered oil. That oil, if produced, would be the cheapest energy source and would be available much sooner than many other energy alternatives. Production from even one small field would provide oil self-sufficiency in many of the poorest countries.

For a number of obvious reasons, the large oil companies have little incentive to search for small fields in remote locations. Although there are excellent petroleum prospects in the Third World, exploration in these countries has been at a low level—not at the level that their geological potential would warrant. The countries need an assessment of their petroleum resources, but they lack the knowledge and technology to do it.

Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation can assist a few countries in their search for oil. It can provide the experience and the technology to assess the petroleum potential and to drill. It may also have a role in the development of the fields it discovers, but the greatest need will remain the need for assistance in exploration. Once a field has been found, the host country will find it comparatively easy to borrow development capital against proven reserves, or to interest an oil company in operating the field.

This crown corporation responds to a pressing need for development assistance that is recognized both by the countries of the Third World and international organizations and agencies. This initiative will probably be imitated in the development assistance programs of other countries, and I am confident that honourable senators will support the funding of Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation as provided in this bill.

There are many parallels that could be drawn between the Canadian experience and the experience of oil-importing Third World countries. Canada has had the advantage of a rich and diverse energy endowment combined with the wealth and human resources to take full advantage of that endowment. Nonetheless, we have been an oil-importing nation and we have faced the problem of assessing and developing our frontier petroleum resources.

The third and last important amendment contained in this bill provides for the repayment to Petro-Canada of the $20 million used to capitalize Canertech, as well as for up to $35 million in additional funding, for a total of $55 million. Canertech, as senators may be aware, is a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, dedicated to helping commercialize conservation and renewable energy technologies. As a Manitoban, I am particularly pleased to see this additional funding for Canertech, which is based in Winnipeg. The company is only a year and a half old, but it is already playing an important role in conservation and diversification.

Bill C-101 was the subject of a thorough and extensive examination by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Energy Legislation. Many witnesses appeared before that committee, including Petro-Canada, the Committee to Canadianize the Petroleum Industry, Canertech, Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation, and the Canadian an Federation of Independent Petroleum Marketers. The committee recommended no amendments to the bill.

Some members of the committee questioned the increase in authorized capital to $5.5 billion, in view of the cutbacks in other areas. Others would have liked to see Petro-Canada make more acquisitions; but no amendments were passed.

An increase in the authorized common share capital of Petro-Canada is needed to carry out its increasing number of explorations and, in the near future, development responsibilities. It should be noted in this respect that Petro-Canada does not have the same access to capital markets as other corporations have. For example, it cannot issue shares for private sale on the market. Therefore, an increased capital supply is essential. The largest expenditures of Petro-Canada are going to be in the exploration for hydrocarbons, and are going to be spent offshore in the north. This is the main priority in expenditures—finding oil.

The amendments contained in this bill will give Petro-Canada and all Canadians, through Petro-Canada, an opportunity to participate more in the development of hydrocarbon resources in Canada. I invite honourable senators to consider these amendments, and I hope they will support them unanimously.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: May I ask the honourable senator a question? What was the limitation under which Petro-Canada was labouring that made this bill necessary?

Senator Molgat: The previous funding was limited to $600 million, and if it is to proceed with the further developments it will require additional capital. That is what I was trying to point out in my introductory comments, namely, that it cannot proceed to do all that it is expected to do in the future on its present funding.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question concerning Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation? I understand that the bill provides for funding in the amount of approximately $60 million. If the international subsidiary decides to drill and explore in a Third World country and finds an interesting natural gas deposit, will the undertaking be on a non-profit basis; or, if there is an interesting find, can we expect that at least the costs involved in the drilling and exploration will be refunded?

Senator Molgat: I stand to be corrected, and I will obtain the precise information, but my understanding is that it would be a non-profit operation, but that we would recover the costs.

Senator Deschatelets: We would recover the costs?

Senator Molgat: That is my understanding. We could also further participate in the development by agreement with the country. It is not intended that it should be a profit-making operation.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Balfour, debate adjourned.

JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE
RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I feel it necessary that I should say a few words on this vital matter. I realize that the hour is late and therefore I shall try to be reasonably brief. In any event, it is not my intention to dwell at any length on, or to go deeply into, the legal aspects of Senator Lang's motion. I congratulate him on bringing the motion forward. It is a necessary matter and one which should be aired. I congratulate him and also Senator Asselin for their well-reasoned and well-delivered arguments in support of the motion. The thesis put forth is a sound one and one that should cause all Canadians a great deal of concern.

As I have said, I have no intention of dealing with the legal precedents. I am not a lawyer, and I would not presume to intrude on the territory of the learned legal members of this chamber.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Perrault did.

Senator Doody: Perhaps I have more to be modest about than has Senator Perrault. I certainly have more modesty. I can comment, and will comment, on the perception that is abroad in this country, particularly in my own province, of the latest and most offensive move by the Government of Canada. I shall comment to a limited degree on the statement of the Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, the statement that he made in St. John's a few days ago, a statement that was read in this chamber by the Minister of State for Economic Development who, fortunately, has duties elsewhere at this time.

● (2150)

Honourable senators, no matter how you slice it, no matter how legalistic the arguments are and no matter how long or how loudly the Leader of the Government in the Senate proclaims otherwise, the simple and short truth of the matter is that the federal Government of Canada has indeed short-circuited the judicial system in Canada. They have gone over the head of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. This cannot but undermine the credibility of the Newfoundland Supreme Court in particular, and the entire Canadian judicial system in general.

The people of my province feel that the Supreme Court of Newfoundland has been shabbily dealt with and degraded, and they look once more at the clumsy, heavy-handed actions of the Government of Canada. They wonder what the reason is for this latest Liberal government's move against Newfoundland. They are told by the federal Minister of Justice in Newfoundland that the reason for the haste is that we must get Hibernia moving and we must resolve the ownership issue, but I shall come back to that shortly.

Honourable senators, do you suppose a great deal of cabinet discussion went into this unfortunate decision? Do you think a federal ministry examined and pondered the possible and probable results, whether they be positive, negative or whatever, that might flow from this act? I suspect not, not if the presentation by the Minister of State for Economic Development of the government's position is an example of how well briefed the ministry was on this issue that is so important to the Canadian court system, to Newfoundland and to all of Canada, and perhaps to the whole confederate system.

You will remember, honourable senators, that last week, when the Minister of State for Economic Development reported to this chamber on the federal reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, he read from Justice Minister Chrétien's press release. The minister said that he had been handed it a few moments before, and apologized for his lack of knowledge on the subject matter. The Minister of Justice himself the previous afternoon told the members of the other place that no decision had been taken on this matter. But the next day we find him in St. John's, which is not a usual haunt of Mr. Chrétien's, making an announcement declaring the matter an accomplished fact.

But on the other hand, if the cabinet did consider all legal and judicial consequences—and, as I say, they have been put forward rather admirably by Senator Lang, Senator Asselin, and I endorse them sincerely—they must have said that the great Hibernia grab was well worth the risk and that they should proceed full speed and to hell with the consequences. They said, "There are only a half million people down there, so we will grab our Hibernia and we will develop it as quickly as we can."

But the reasons put forward by the various ministers here, and the various ministers in the other place, for this ill-timed reference do not hold up all that well under any sort of examination. This matter, the development and production of the oil and gas reserves in the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, has been, we are told, a matter of discussion and negotiation for 14 or 15 years. That is an exaggeration, of course. It is in the same mood as the discussions concerning the Constitution, which we were told had been going on for some 50 years. These negotiations have been on again, off again for a few weeks or a month, and then put aside for another occasion.

In reality, the matter has been under consideration and unresolved for a very long time. I know first-hand what went down for most of that time from early 1972, when I became Minister of Mines, Agriculture and Resources for the Province of Newfoundland, until 1979, when I elected not to seek re-election. At that time I held the Mines and Energy portfolio, and I was very deeply involved in all these offshore discussions, all the background material, all the matters resolved or attempted to be resolved by the association of the five eastern provinces and subsequently by the three maritime provinces.

I can recall quite vividly many of the intricacies of the considerations. In saying that I must point out that at all times it was felt by all the participants that Newfoundland's particular position, because of the way in which it had entered confederation and because of its own historical background, was indeed quite different from those of its sister provinces in the rest of Canada. But from all these discussions and negotiations, I would like to try to condense for the attention of honourable senators what had to be the bottom line in terms of Newfoundland's position—the Newfoundland need in the matter.

It is a very complex, involved and important issue, perhaps the most important issue our province has ever faced. The most simplistic way of saying it is this: In Newfoundland, the people who live there at the present time and the people who will live there in the future must have a meaningful say in the development of what they feel to be a resource they own.

It is common knowledge, of course, that the most important single industry in Newfoundland, the traditional lifestyle that shaped Newfoundland's historical cultural pattern, is the fisheries which is perhaps what makes that province somewhat different from the rest of Canada. The people of Newfoundland settled as close to the sea as they could. Their homes are pitched on rocks at the ocean side and hang from cliffs, and their natural bent is to get as close to the water side as they can. That vital industry and that cultural symbol of the past and their future is controlled completely in Ottawa. Newfoundlanders have absolutely no participation in the policy formulation or decision-making process of that most important single aspect of the life of Newfoundland.

I will give an example that I read about in the St. John's Evening Telegram when I was home this weekend. This item refers to the provincial Minister of Fisheries announcing to the press that he has just learned that the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans has entered an agreement to give Russian fishermen a direct allocation of 103,360 metric tons of fish within Canada's 200-mile limit, including 10,500 tons of capelin. It is difficult for the people in Newfoundland to understand that kind of reasoning. Nobody consults them or even tells them of such matters; they read it in the paper.

The unemployment situation in that province is pathetic. It is horrendous. Fish plants are closed down all over the place, the trawlers are tied up and the owners of smaller boats are going into debt and having their boats repossessed, and the Government of Canada, in its wisdom and logic, allocates another 103,360 metric tonnes, 232.5 million pounds, of fish within Canada's 200-mile limit to the Russian fishery.

As I say, there may very well be some great international reasoning, some great logic in terms of international trade or in terms of Canada's policing and enforcing the 200-mile economic zone. But what I am trying to say is that the people of Newfoundland are not participating in such matters and we are told nothing about them.

Now we come to that same area, not to the wealth that is swimming in the sea but the wealth that sits under the sea, under the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and we are told that once again that this resource will be taken completely out of the hands of the people of Newfoundland in terms of management, and that they will have no say in their future as it is affected by that resource.

Honourable senators have heard, and properly so, that the Government of Canada has offered what, in its consideration, are generous terms. They are going to give the people of Newfoundland up to 100 per cent of the revenue for a certain specified period of time. The people in Newfoundland say, "Why are they giving us what we already own? They are taking our house, are going to rent it to somebody else and give us some of the rent."

I think that the figure of 100 per cent of the revenue is something that should be elaborated on more thoroughly by the honourable gentlemen opposite, because we do not know what it is 100 per cent of. Is it 100 per cent of the gross revenue, or is it 100 per cent of the net revenue? Is it 100 per cent of the revenue exclusive of what Petro-Canada takes, because there is acreage out there now of which Petro-Canada already owns 47.5 per cent through its 25 per cent back-in provision. Do the people of Newfoundland get 100 per cent of Petro-Canada's take, or is that taken off the top? I do not know what we get 100 per cent of, and no one else seems to know.

More importantly, as I said at the outset, and not to minimize the full importance of the economic impact on the province and the necessity of getting a fair share of the economic rent, I want to ask honourable senators to imagine with me the impact that an uncontrolled rate of development of that huge oil field off the coast of the province will have on the province.

There are half a million people located in the province. Newfoundland has a huge land mass with a small and scattered population; Newfoundland has a different historical and cultural pattern and background; a life-style that has been traditionally different, but which is now changing. I ask honourable senators to consider the impact on the social structure of that island of an uncontrolled, pell-mell, full-rushed development. I think the impact will be horrendous. I cannot imagine anything that could be conceivably worse, and that includes the non-production of Hibernia forever.

The people of Newfoundland have lived there too long, have suffered too much, have gone through too much history in a most difficult way to see it all go down the drain for 10, 15 or 20 years of uncontrolled oil development for the benefit of the rest of the world.

I do not want honourable senators to think that the people of Newfoundland are not anxious or willing to share this with the rest of the world, particularly with the rest of Canada. A more grateful and hospitable and decent people I do not think honourable senators will find if they were to travel this world forever.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: The people of Newfoundland know what Canada has done for them. What they are asking now is the right to do something for themselves, yet, honourable senators, bureaucrats in Ottawa do not seem to appreciate that. They are saying that they are giving the people of Newfoundland that, and the people of Newfoundland are saying that they want to earn that. The bureaucrats in Ottawa are saying that they are giving them equalization, and the people of Newfoundland are saying, "Keep your equalization; let us earn some profit from our resources. Give us some say in our own future and let us try to control our own destiny. We are as adult and as mature—perhaps more so—than some other people across this country; let us demonstrate that."

In any event, because of these things, and because of the ongoing quarrels with the central government, I would not want honourable senators to think for a moment that Newfoundlanders are not, at least, as Canadian as the rest of you. In fact, many of us in Newfoundland are Canadians by choice. We voted to become Canadians; many honourable senators present were born Canadians, and had no option. We are proud and happy to be part of this great union of Confederation, and perhaps that is why we complain and cry and screech more bitterly when we see damage done to the delicate fabric of this nation.

If Mr. Smallwood were here, as Senator Rowe can tell you, he would be able to list every hospital bed that has been built in those 33 years of Confederation, mile of road that has been put in, every school that has been put up, and how many books have been written—some of them by my honourable and esteemed colleague who was recently honoured with a doctorate, for which I congratulate him. In moving all of this distance in those more than 30 years of Confederation, let me tell honourable senators a sad but true fact. The per capita income of the people of Newfoundland is now 48 per cent of the national average. In 1949 it was 43 per cent. We have come forward five percentage points over the past 30-odd years. That is not a real record performance in all honesty, and there has not been all that much complaining because there has not been all that much that could be done about it, but the people in Newfoundland think that there is something that can be done now, and it appears from where they sit that they will be no further ahead, and perhaps they will be further behind, if the foreign oil companies and big wheels from Dallas have their way.

I visited Aberdeen when I was a minister of various departments in the Government of Newfoundland. I saw what happened in Aberdeen. We spent a great deal of time working with the Island Development Association in Scotland, just as we spent a great deal of time in Stavanger, Norway. We studied the Norwegian picture and saw what they did there. Even with their strict socialistic controls, they still had a horrendous social problem. They bottled all of the development inside compounds and in enclaves, and refused to allow foreign workers to live in apartments outside of those compounds or enclaves. They had a horrible time trying to control things.

I am not suggesting that that sort of thing could happen in Newfoundland—I can assure you that it never will—but I am saying that there are people in Newfoundland who are aware of what the consequences of uncontrolled and unsympathetic development are and what that can do to their province. I seriously question whether there are many people in this great city in which I now live, who are as aware of the situation in Newfoundland as the people who live there. That is why they ask for some participation; that is why they ask for some say in management.

As I have said, the unemployment rate is indescribable—I suppose it is describable: it is incredible. I would suggest that it is at least twice, and probably three times, the national average. Last week the budget was brought down in Newfoundland, at which time it was announced that the provincial debt is now $3.3 billion. That, honourable senators, is a tremendous burden for a half million people to carry—people who have no control over their own destiny with the economy the way it is, with short-term money, rollovers, and so on. The tax rates down there are cruel; the people really cannot be taxed any more. They desperately need that offshore development, but it has to be an orderly development carried out in an orderly manner with provincial participation.

Honourable senators, I am moving along as quickly as I can. A few minutes ago, I spoke of the line of argument that has been put forward regarding the federal reference to the Supreme Court at the present time. Apart from the legal arguments, which I think are valid but which will be decided elsewhere, the moral and historical arguments are indisputable. There are others who would disagree with that statement, but these arguments that were put forward in Canada were never really accepted. As honourable senators have stated, this dispute has been going on now for 14 or 15 years.

In despair and frustration, the Government of Newfoundland put a reference to the Newfoundland Supreme Court, asking that learned and most respected group of men to decide this ownership issue. A few days ago, the Government of Canada took its reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. It has asked the Supreme Court of Canada to decide the question of jurisdiction and ownership—not of the offshore in its entirety, I might point out. I will refer to a quote of the Newfoundland reference to the Newfoundland Court of Appeal on February 12, 1982, which was quite short and explicit.

Do the lands, mines, minerals, royalties or other rights, including the right to explore and exploit, and the right to legislate with respect to the mineral and other natural resources of the seabed and subsoil from the ordinary low-water mark of the Province of Newfoundland to the seaward limit of the continental shelf or any part thereof belong or otherwise appertain to the Province of Newfoundland?

The province was willing to put this issue to the court and have the court decide upon it.

On May 19, the federal government brought its own reference to the Supreme Court. It did not ask the Supreme Court of Canada to decide on the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil from the low water mark, and so forth—no. It definitely did not ask the Supreme Court of Canada to decide on the issue of ownership or jurisdiction over the Hibernia oil field, which is what the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Honourable the Minister of Justice stated in their press releases, and the Prime Minister in his letter to the Premier of Newfoundland. What is asked for in the federal reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is the right to jurisdiction over and ownership of the entire 820 square miles of potential oil bearing structures off the east coast of Newfoundland.

Anything out there that has a potential of an oil reserve—and if my memory serves me correctly, there are some 14 geological structures with great oil bearing potential, one of which is Hibernia, but there are others such as South Tempest and Ben Nevis, none of which have been tested as extensively as Hibernia—the government wants to own. All of the rest of the area—the shelf, the trench, the slope—the people of Newfoundland can, presumably, continue to claim jurisdiction over because it is all whale pasture. There has been no mineral potential demonstrated so far, and, if the people of Newfoundland want to assure themselves by saying that they have jurisdiction over this area, well, that is not going to interfere with the grand designs of the Government of Canada. If, however, in the future, it is demonstrated that the gas reserves off the coast of Labrador are economically viable and can be developed profitably, then I presume the Government of Canada will try to demonstrate its ownership of that area as well. In the meantime, however, the federal government has quite modestly and generously restricted its reference to include the 820 square miles of potential oil reserves.

That vulgar and precipitous action was taken by the Government of Canada a few days ago. The matter was already before the courts, and properly so. A few days ago I heard one minister say in this chamber that they had to make the oil companies happy; there was too much indecision; there was no stability or confidence; and the oil companies were disturbed and had to be satisfied.

Honourable senators, I agree with that. It is nice to have the oil companies satisfied. It is great to have the economy of this country put back on its feet again. It is good to try to instill confidence in the business community. Perhaps nothing could be more desirable—except a reasonable deal for the people of Newfoundland. In my opinion, that is more desirable. Not at any cost do we want to make the oil companies happy and the national energy policy a success. There are some limits.

This federal Liberal government set forth a national energy policy a year and a half ago which was an unqualified disaster. Last night the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tried to put a few patches—$2 billion worth of patches—on it. Once again, nobody is happy. The oil companies say it is not enough; other people in Canada say it is too much. We go from disaster to disaster. This is not to make the people of Canada happy; it is to make the oil companies happy.

We have a national energy policy that has been a complete flop. The $13.5 billion Alsands project crashes; the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline is put off for another two years; Cold Lake has gone the way of all dreams; and on and on it goes. What is left? Well, there are 820 square miles of oil potential off the coast of Newfoundland. Maybe we can salvage something with that. The demolition experts have rolled in to wreck the rest of the energy industry in Canada, and now they are going to see what they can do with Newfoundland's offshore. Well, honourable senators, if they have their way, there is no doubt in my mind that it will end up in the same white elephant stable as all those other great and pious dreams of the Government of Canada, because they will find a way to make a snarl of it.

An editorial appeared in the May 3 issue of Canada's national newspaper entitled "The Demolition Experts," and it details at great length exactly what this government is capable of doing in retrograde policy—how capable it is of wrecking the economy of the country. That is a non-partisan article. It was not written by an angry, disturbed Newfoundlander, nor was it written by a partisan Tory politician. That was written by the editorial board of the Globe and Mail.

Honourable senators, this government of ours is now prepared to lead us in a headlong rush to develop the fields off Newfoundland, to salvage their energy policies on the backs of the Newfoundland people. Do you wonder that the people of Newfoundland are nervous and angry?

I suppose, honourable senators, that I should, for a few moments, talk about the position of the Government of Canada in terms of the negotiations over the past years. As I said earlier, the Government of Newfoundland, when I was a member of that government and subsequently, felt that the bottom line was the management of the development of the resource. The easiest and the most sensible way to ensure that was to develop, approve and demonstrate the ownership of the resource. The Government of Canada took the position that that is not really the most important thing. The most important thing is a sensible revenue-sharing position with a joint management regime. At this fundamental issue, the discussions always bogged down. We could work out fringe areas; we could work out other items; but these two basic issues—Newfoundland's ownership claim and the federal government's insistence that the most sensible way is a joint management agreement with ownership put aside—were never resolved. In May of last year the Prime Minister, in an address given in Newfoundland to the people of Newfoundland, stated:

My colleagues and I . . . have constantly maintained that your best interest lies not in total provincial control of the offshore but in rather . . . a negotiated partnership between our two Governments in joint management. We consistently maintain that ownership is not the important issue and that reaching a negotiated agreement on shared management is the vitally important issue.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister then went on to talk about the alternative, which would be court cases, which would not be desirable; it would be far better to get a negotiated political settlement.

• (2220)

Subsequently, the Government of Newfoundland submitted a document entitled "A Framework for Agreement" on November 12, 1981, and later on a document entitled "A Proposal for Settlement". I have these documents with me, but I will not go into them unless honourable senators want me to. "A Proposal for Settlement" was presented in Montreal on January 25, 1982. A paper was received from the Government of Canada in December in response to its "Framework" document, and once again it asserted federal ownership and control, which appeared to be quite contradictory to the Prime Minister's comments in May of the same year.

The following are some quotes from the federal paper:

The Canadian Government's position is that, under the Constitution, offshore ownership and jurisdiction are Federal.

The Federal position is that offshore oil and gas resources belong to all Canadians on whose behalf they are managed by the Federal Government.

There is another quote which is obviously taken out of context because even I, in my present frame of mind, cannot believe that the federal government said:

A permanent arrangement for dealing with offshore petroleum resources is not desirable—

That is a quotation from the document and there must be more to the sentence that was left out.

Subsequently, a further proposal was made. On January 25 the Government of Newfoundland put forward a proposal which they called a compromise proposal. In it, honourable senators, they backed away from the ownership claim that had been the base rock of our position for the past 14 or 15 years, and probably before that. They proposed a joint management regime. It sounded to me suspiciously like the Prime Minister's proposal of May 1981. A proposal was put forward in this compromise proposal which was promptly labelled the "capitulation scenario" by federal bureaucrats, and outside this arena it was called "A proposal for Settlement." It outlined the basic principles that Newfoundland's position entailed, and it proposed that three main principles be set forward as the basis for negotiation.

First, both parties were to set aside permanently their claims to exclusive ownership of the offshore. Second, there was to be joint management of offshore resources, with each government having an equal role in decision-making. And third, there was to be an equitable sharing of all revenues between both governments as a matter of right. I notice that the Government of Newfoundland once again has revenue sharing as a matter of right; they do not want to be "given."

To survive the actions of future parliaments or legislatures, the document called for the essential features of any negotiated settlement to be entrenched in the Constitution. It is quite possible that the Government of Newfoundland is not completely at ease with the promised commitments of the Government of Canada. I will leave it to honourable senators' imaginations to ponder why.

On the issue of revenue sharing, Newfoundland wanted 75 per cent of the government take until it achieved both economic and fiscal maturity. Economic maturity would be reached when per capita earned income approached that of the mature provinces such as Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. As I said earlier, the per capita income in Newfoundland is now 48 per cent of the national average, after 30-some years of Confederation.

Fiscal maturity would be reached when a number of broad social and economic goals had been achieved. These include: a public service on a par with those in the so-called benchmark provinces; the financing of capital expenditures from provincial revenues rather than from borrowings—this year in the provincial budget once again they are proposing to borrow $325 million; the reduction of provincial tax burdens to the national average—not an unreasonable ambition for a province of Canada; the reduction of the provincial debt to the level of the benchmark provinces; and the establishment of a depletion fund against the day the wells run dry—which is not an original idea either.

Once these and other requirements were met, the provincial revenue split would begin to diminish. But under an escape clause, the provincial share of revenues would rise again if the province started to fall below the benchmark provinces at any time in the future.

On the question of joint management of offshore resources, the document called for the establishment of a seven-member executive board with three members each from the federal and provincial governments and an independent chairman. This contrasts with the makeup of the board created by the Nova Scotia-Ottawa agreement, incidentally, honourable senators, which is for three federal and two provincial members, leaving clear control over development in the hands of the federal government, a position not acceptable to the Province of Newfoundland and one that never was.

The informal federal response to this proposal was that it amounted to a formula for stalemate, since it left two sets of hands on every lever. That is a rather unfortunate indictment of an independent chairman who has yet to be named or suggested. In any event, the proposal was put forward to the Government of Canada and, as I say, it was labelled as a capitulation scenario and was rejected out of hand. Subsequently, a few days ago, the Government of Canada brought its reference to the Supreme Court of Canada over the heads of the High Court of Newfoundland.

There are a few highlights of the agreement, and perhaps honourable senators will permit me to mention them while I have their attention, although I am not going to impose on it much longer.

It establishes the principle of both governments setting aside their ownership claims and becoming co-owners of the resource. Both governments would receive their share of revenues directly from a joint agency. Arrangements could only be changed with the consent of both governments. The agreement could not be torn up by either party, as happened in Australia, and the precedent is there as a major benefits package which is ambitious in terms of Newfoundland's history, but not overly ambitious in terms of the potential of the offshore resource. They talk about a fair split of the offshore revenue and a need for a fair market price for offshore oil and gas. It seems that I have heard that before somewhere in the west. It refers to an appropriate revenue collection system, including participation by crown corporations in the establishment of crown reserves. The province would initially receive its traditional share which had been received by western provinces for their oil and gas resources—75 per cent of the total government oil revenues. The provinces' traditional share would continue until trigger points based on fiscal and economic factors are reached. Of course, there is the need to replace equalization in an orderly manner.

The agency is described as an outline. There is protection of crown corporations, and protection of fisheries as a single set of regulations for environmental protection. Of absolutely indescribable concern to the Province of Newfoundland is the protection of the fishery during that offshore development.

Honourable senators, with that in mind, Premier Peckford wired the Prime Minister asking that the court cases be put aside and that an agreement be reached based on the points, none of which is carved in concrete. It was subsequently rejected and the reference was made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I spent the weekend in Newfoundland, and I have attempted to explain the concern and worry of the people in my province, which I have done as well as I could, although not adequately. It is a matter of grave concern. They do not understand the attitude of the Government of Canada, and they know that the Government of Canada does not understand them. They are kind of lost, and I am sure that it would be very beneficial to everyone if some way could be found to alleviate their concerns, to try to convince the people of Newfoundland that it is not the intention of Canada to keep them as lesser Canadians, but that they should have the right to aspire to the same place in the sun as other Canadians enjoy.

I admire Senator Cook for his position. I can only suggest that honourable senators think carefully of the deal that would eventually be made with Newfoundland, and I ask them to try to influence the Government of Canada to treat the people of Newfoundland with justice and decency and to leave them their pride, for God's sake.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-115, intituled: "An Act to establish a national program for occupational training", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 2, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HUMAN RIGHTS

LOWER CANADA—RECOGNITION OF 150TH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF JEWISH EMANCIPATION ACT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to draw to your attention the fact that Friday of this week, June 5, marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation by King William IV of the law according to Jewish persons all the rights and privileges of other subjects resident in Lower Canada. This event was mentioned yesterday in the Quebec National Assembly, and a motion was also adopted by the other place.

It was John Neilson, editor of the Quebec Gazette who petitioned for, and Louis-Joseph Papineau who sponsored in the legislature, this remarkable bill, the first of its kind in the British Empire, as it was then known. Not until some years later in the United States, and, I believe, 1857 in Great Britain, was the same privilege granted the citizens of those countries.

Twenty-four years earlier Ezekiel Hart had been elected for Trois-Rivières, but had been refused his seat. The process repeated itself in 1809, and it was 23 more years before this injustice was rectified. In its often frustratingly slow fashion, a consensus on the need to rectify this horrible inequity was not achieved until 1831, and it was a year later that the King was finally able to proclaim the extension of full rights and privileges.

I firmly believe that we should acknowledge and applaud those the world over who crusade for religious and political tolerance. I am proud that it was leaders in the part of Canada I come from who provided guidance to the entire British Empire. I pay tribute today to their wisdom.

[Translation]

I feel that this is indeed worthy of our attention, especially since there are people among us of Jewish origin who are making an exceptional contribution to the work of this house, as so many in fact are doing in every sphere of activity in Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to add congratulations on behalf of the government and my colleagues on this side of the House, and I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for having drawn our attention to this historic event. We also wish to congratulate the honourable senator's predecessors in history in the province of Quebec, who laid the foundation for this movement and these historic reforms.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, although I do not rise with any official status, I am sure that the Canadian Jewish community would be very pleased if I expressed my appreciation to Senator Flynn for drawing this important anniversary to the attention of the Senate and to the people of Canada.

It is an important anniversary, and one that is unique. Senator Flynn pointed out—correctly, as usual—that Canada was the first country in the British Empire, at least, to allow those of the Jewish faith the privilege of being elected to Parliament and taking a seat.

Before 1832 that was impossible because of the necessity to take an oath of the Christian faith and that was not acceptable to those like Ezekiel Hart. They were elected but were unable to take the oath of office.

I express my appreciation to the people of Quebec, to their leaders at that time, who were far-seeing and who set the standard for the kinds of relationships that now exist, not only between religious groups in Canada, but also between the various ethnic groups which make up the population of this country.

Having said that, I would add that we should not rest on our laurels. We must remember that just as freedoms are won with difficulty, they can be lost rather easily. In these days of much tension, be it regional, racial, linguistic or religious, not only in Canada but across the world, eternal vigilance is the price we have to pay to ensure that the great tradition established 150 years ago continues in this fine country of ours.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE HONOURABLE RHÉAL BÉLISLE

FELICITATIONS ON BESTOWAL OF PAPAL HONOUR

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on this occasion to say that recently there came to my attention an invitation to attend a ceremony which took place in the City of Ottawa. It was the kind of ceremony which I would not normally have mentioned in this chamber, but yesterday the Acting Leader of the Government rose in his place to pay tribute to two members of the Senate who were recently honoured by civil institutions by having honorary degrees conferred upon them. I thought that that was a nice gesture.

The honour bestowed upon the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle is a papal honour, and the highest honour the Roman Catholic Church bestows on lay people. When I received the invitation to attend the ceremony I examined it and, lo, like Abou Ben Adhem's, Senator Bélisle's name led all the rest.

I was not among those present, but have done some research with respect to how that order has touched upon this house and have found that there are other members of the Senate who have received the same honour. There are three members of the Senate who have had that honour bestowed upon them, and one of them—and I shall only mention one—is Senator Guay. He received that honour before Senator Bélisle but, in any event, it is an honour for this house that any of its members should be singled out by the Papacy for recognition and by the bestowal upon them of such a high honour.

I have nothing further to say on this except that by law Senator Bélisle is now entitled to be called not the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, but Sir Rhéal Bélisle. For those who are not sure of how he should be addressed, I will say that is now his proper title.

Honourable senators, I ask you to join with me in congratulating Senator Bélisle on his being given this honour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: As a colleague twice over of my friend, Rhéal Bélisle, first as a senator for several years and especially as a member of the Order of St. Gregory the Great for many years, it is a pleasure for me to acknowledge in this respected house the merits of Senator Bélisle, which have now been confirmed by His Holiness Pope John Paul II who has made the senator a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

As you probably know, this is a very select order, whose membership throughout the world is limited to 300. I am especially proud that this exceptional honour was bestowed on our colleague by this particular Pope, who is a world traveller and truly catholic in the etymological sense of the word.

Actually, our colleague and friend has himself sailed in international waters, and has an abiding interest in the more profound aspects of our humanity. He has a bachelor's degree in theology from St. Paul University in Ottawa and an honorary doctorate from Laurentian University in Sudbury, and he has always been very active at the municipal, provincial and finally federal level.

To demonstrate that our colleague's interests are not solely spiritual and that there is also a bit of the naturalist in him, I may add that he is one of the directors of the Canadian Wildlife Federation. As you can see, Senator Bélisle literally has shoulders that can carry a considerable burden.

My dear Rhéal, I am sure that I am conveying the best wishes of all your colleagues in the Senate in offering my warmest congratulations.

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on Friday evening it was my privilege to attend a function in the West Block in honour of Senator Bélisle. I was late arriving because of my attendance at another function in Kingston on that day. However, I did arrive in time to hear the archbishop's remarks.

On listening to the archbishop talk about record unemployment, interest rates, and the loss of confidence among the people of this country, I found myself, both as a Conservative and a Protestant, giving him hearty applause. Archbishop Plourde then went on to speak of the need for spiritual renewal as the best hope he saw for mankind. I still applauded, but I reached a decision that I would keep on mentioning the economy, and I would leave the spiritual renewal to the new Knights of the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

I should like to mention one part of the archbishop's remarks that impressed me, and it concerned his difficulty in selecting the persons to be honoured. He selected one from public life, one from the field of medicine, one from the field of economics, one from the universities, one from the judiciary, and one from the field of business. He then described his difficulty in selecting the individual within each of these six fields. He concluded with this statement, which I appreciated very much, "When I made this selection, I felt I had honoured the others within the group." That makes it very easy for us to share in the honour conferred upon Senator Bélisle, and to offer our congratulations.

Honourable senators, I was impressed by the number of people who had journeyed from Sudbury last Friday for the dinner in honour of the new Knights of the Order of St. Gregory the Great. I believe Senator Bélisle received as high a tribute from their attendance as he did on a previous occasion.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Donahoe, Senator Guay and Senator Phillips for their kind words. They spoke from their hearts with so much generosity and charity that I am very grateful to them. I know that when I accepted this great honour it was given not only to my humble self, but also to the Senate as a whole, and I thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to inform honourable senators that yesterday, as Speaker of the Senate, I attended the ceremonies organized in Quebec by the Canadian Jewish Congress. That is why I was absent from the chamber. I also represented the Senate at the dinner in honour of Senator Bélisle.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

That the name of the Honourable Senator Guay be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Inman on the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

● (1420)

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the minister explain to us why the markets went down even lower than anticipated? Is that the result of the new policy of the energy minister?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think it is. There was, in fact, an improvement of something like $2 billion in the cash flow over the time frame that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was talking about. I do not believe, therefore, that the two things are related.

If my honourable friend wants me to give him some lessons on how the market responds to an anticipated statement and what happens afterwards, I can do so. However, he is probably more familiar with those kinds of things than I am, having spent more of his time following them. I would not presume to give him any lessons in that area.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Can the minister confirm that the Canadian dollar was trading this morning at less than 80 cents American? Will he say whether this continuing decline in the value of the dollar is caused by Mr. Lalonde's announcement of the other night, by the announcements of Mr. Trudeau and Mr. MacEachen to the effect that a revised economic policy is coming, or by Senator Perrault's speech to the Liberals in the Okanagan last weekend?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could give my opinion, and it is not a confirmation or a denial of all of that. My honourable friend is entitled to put whatever interpretation on it he likes, but to be more precise about it, I have been advised that the Canadian dollar, in relation to the U.S. dollar, had in fact hit a low of 79.94 cents.

Senator Murray: Another new record!

Senator Olson: As of noon today, it was back up to 80.03 cents.

Senator Murray: That is still pretty low.

Senator Olson: I think it is fair to say that the decline in the Canadian dollar in recent days has occurred against the background of a very strong United States dollar in the international scene. The United States dollar, in relation to all major currencies, has caused a great deal of flurry in those markets.

I can keep repeating this, if my honourable friends would like me to. They are attempting to attribute a great deal, or perhaps all, of the fault with respect to the value of the dollar to some statements or actions that have been made recently in Canada.

Senator Murray: And the general lack of confidence in government policies.

Senator Olson: Unfortunately, they do not seem to wish to accept the same explanation as applies to the currencies of Japan, Germany, France, the United Kingdom, and almost all other currencies—including, by the way, the Italian lira; it is in the same category.

Senator Flynn: That is for the information of Senator Bosa!

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM: UPDATE 1982

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday oil and gas shares suffered their biggest decline in almost three months. Does Senator Olson or the government react to this decline as indicating a negative outlook towards the NEP changes announced on Monday night by Mr. Lalonde?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I tried yesterday to explain that we are treading on dangerous ground or thin ice—however you want to express it—when we try to explain logically why the stock market makes certain moves. My guess is that it is the shareholders' elective interpretation of a number of things.

What my honourable friend forgot to mention—and he is an expert at that, so I am not criticizing him—was that the market did, in fact, show some anticipation, especially in the last two or three days of last week, when the market, particularly the oil and gas sector, went into a rather steep incline. Of course, there is a saying—and you know it as well as I do—that the market rises in anticipation and usually falls on realization of the new rules. I suppose that again happened in this case.

Senator Flynn: Speaking of expertise, I would suggest that the minister is quite an expert himself in walking on thin ice. He has been able to survive up to now, but one of these days it will crack for good.

Is the minister suggesting that the government anticipated the fall of the stock market, and does the government think that is a good thing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did not say that at all. I said that there was obviously some anticipation in the market for two or three days last week when there was an incline, particularly in the oil and gas sector. After the firm policy announcement, part of which was anticipated, I suppose an adjustment always follows. All I am suggesting to my honourable friend is that history is probably repeating itself in this case.

Senator Flynn: Anticipation usually results in a rise in the stock market, and realization in a fall?

Senator Olson: That is exactly what happened. Last week for several days, my honourable friend will recall, there was an increase in the market, especially in the oil and gas sector.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: There has been a general decline of all of those currencies, in relation to the American dollar, over the past few days. As a matter of fact, on a percentage basis, the decline of the Canadian dollar relative to the American dollar has been somewhat less than most of these other currencies. It seems to me that it follows from that, honourable senators, that if my honourable friends want to use that argument for all these currencies they suggest that everybody is out of step except the United States, as far as the management of the economy is concerned.

I want to suggest that the Canadian government has expressed the view very frankly for a number of weeks, if not, indeed, for months, that there is a disproportionate position with respect to inflation and other costs. In other words, the total image of our economy with regard to remaining competitive has concerned us a great deal. Canada has not kept pace with the United States in terms of our inflation rate, interest rates, and other factors that are relative to this matter. That concerns us.

• (1425)

It should also be noted that in the last few days there has been speculation in the marketplace that interest rates are again going to rise in the United States. If that is so, then, of course, the reaction in markets, not only in Canada but in Europe and the Far East and various other places, will be exactly what could be expected.

INDUSTRY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development if he has received any request, in connection with Dome Petroleum, for a handout. If so, what is the nature of the request, has the minister considered it, and will we have a chance to debate the issue in this house before a decision is made?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, a similar question was asked yesterday and one day last week. The reply to today's question is exactly the same as it was to those other questions.

Senator Walker: If you want to reply you can do so quickly now; that is, if you still have the answer.

Senator Olson: I answered before. What I said before was that I have no knowledge of any request of the kind you have mentioned. I did give an undertaking to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he had received a formal request. With the qualifications that I have just enumerated, the answer to your question is "no".

Senator Walker: You did not consult him, then. The answer is "no".

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The Prime Minister has often said that the way to correct the high interest rates we are being forced to live with at this time would be to lower the Canadian dollar to 75 cents American. Is the fact that the dollar is now at 80 cents, and could soon be at 75 cents, an indication that there is a change in the policy of the government? Is it intended to allow a decrease in the value of the dollar in order to correct high interest rates?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I think the Leader of the Opposition has that completely wrong, and I am not surprised at that, though I am not trying to pick a fight with him.

What the Prime Minister has said, in response to those who advocate an arbitrary imposition of lower interest rates, is that the consequence would be a declining dollar. That is the exact opposite of the way my honourable friend put it.

I should like to draw his attention, however, to what I said only a moment ago, which was that if interest rates have started to move up in the United States, so as to put the American dollar out of line relative to the value of our dollar, obviously the Canadian dollar is going to decline in relative terms.

Senator Flynn: The minister is telling us that it is not as a result of a decision by the government that we are presumably faced with both high interest rates and a low dollar.

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance has repeatedly said that the Canadian government has no intention of deliberately devaluing the dollar.

At the first ministers' conference here early in February a number of provinces advised that we should somehow move into the market without really finding how that was to be done, but that we should certainly force down interest rates. If we had followed that advice, of course, the consequence would have been a declining dollar, for the reasons stated at the time, and which I have now again put in the proper order.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING, VERSAILLES, FRANCE—CANADIAN OBJECTIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Olson has repeatedly stated that all the economic solutions to Canada's problems will be made known after the Versailles Summit. This event is supposed to solve a great many problems, especially in Canada. Considering the importance of the Economic Summit in Versailles, could the minister inform this house of the major objectives the government intends to pursue at this meeting in an attempt to resolve our economic problems? Tomorrow, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are leaving Canada to represent the Canadian government at the Summit. Could the minister inform us of the objectives the government will be trying to achieve at that meeting?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not believe that anyone, including myself, has attempted to convey to my honourable friend or his colleagues—and, indeed, the Canadian public—that all of the economic problems are going to be solved at the summit meeting in Versailles.

It is a distorted interpretation that my honourable friend puts on that. But that is the opposition's function. The apparent self-appointed function of the opposition is to put that kind of distortion on it. That is nothing new. That has been done by opposition parties in the past—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And by governments. You are a pretty good distorter yourself.

An Hon. Senator: We never did it.

Senator Olson: No, we never did it quite that way.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The minister cannot refrain from smiling.

Senator Olson: In any event, I should like to suggest to my honourable friend that, certainly, a position has been stated by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister with respect to the proposals that Canada will be putting forward. We are extremely concerned about the high interest rates and the reasons for those high interest rates being held by the leading industrial and financial nation in the world, namely, the United States. We know also that at the last summit meeting, that was held in Ottawa in August 1981, some undertakings were given that by the end of the year—that is, 1981—there would be a modification of policy within the United States that would provide some relief from these very high interest rates and the economic downturn and other consequences that flow therefrom. Certainly, Canada will again express that view.

As I have said, there are a number of related matters that contribute to holding those interest rates as high as they are in the leading industrial and financial nation in the western world, and we are concerned about it now, just as we were approximately 10 months ago.

Senator Flynn: No change!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CURRENT STATUS OF FUND

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Before he replies, I wish to point out to my colleagues that I will phrase my question in such a way that I shall not be accused, as is the wont of the minister, of distortion or of giving a preamble, which he will seize upon as a way of evading the responsibility of answering the question. I will ask direct questions which can be given direct answers—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: —and I am phrasing them in such a way that the minister will be unable to say that he cannot answer because of the preamble to the question or because it has been distorted. I find that I am in danger of making a speech so I will resort to the question.

● (1435)

My first question is very easy: Will the minister bring to the Senate a report on the current status of the unemployment insurance fund, and projections for the remainder of 1982? Yes or no?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I can ask for that, and if I get it I can bring it here.

Senator Donahoe: Thank you for that response. It justifies my preamble.

The second question is also easy. The Minister of Finance has acknowledged that unemployment for 1982 may be above 9 per cent. I believe that is a factual statement. I hear no opposition to it. Does the minister agree?

Honourable senators will notice what I ask. I do not ask the minister for an opinion. I merely ask him: Yes or no, do you agree?

Senator Olson: That is asking for an opinion.

Senator Donahoe: Does the minister agree that, should unemployment remain at that level, employers and employees will face substantially higher premiums next year, unless the government is prepared to fund any unemployment insurance deficit out of general revenue?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether or not it is a matter of agreeing, I suppose when the senator puts it in that context he is really asking for my opinion on where the funding requirements would come from. I suppose it could be one or the other, or a combination of both.

Senator Donahoe: Again, I thank the honourable minister for his answer, although I say to him that a braver course would have been for him to say "yes" or "no", as my question gave him the opportunity to do; but, as usual, he chose to evade the question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is called "waffling".

Senator Donahoe: I have a further question, which I would like the minister to take as notice. Will he determine for me and other senators, please, what percentage of revenues accruing to the unemployment insurance fund in 1982 the government expects will come from those whose income is less than the maximum of $18,200 in insurable earnings?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice.

THE ECONOMY

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CAPITAL OUTFLOW, INTEREST RATES AND INFLATION RATE

Hon. R. James Balfour: Will the Minister of State for Economic Development, with his superior wisdom, explain the relationship between the 600 per cent increase in capital outflow from Canada in 1981, a direct result of the so-called National Energy Program, and Canadian interest rate levels and Canadian rates of inflation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I could give that kind of undertaking, and perhaps I will include that information as part of the remarks I will probably make in a speech some time later this month, but there will be many other details in with that. Of course, my honourable friend is doing what he has done before. He is selecting one or two aspects of the economy and is trying to lay the whole responsibility on them, when he knows very well that there are other factors at work as well.

Senator Balfour: Will the honourable minister identify those other factors?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can do that and I will be very glad to, but that cannot be done in just a few minutes; it will take a considerable amount of time. My honourable friend, of course, failed to mention one of the most obvious factors at this point in time, and that is the difference in rate of return on interest earned in some other countries. Of course, in the next breath he will complain that interest rates are too high here, but in doing so he will contradict his own argument.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Can the minister tell us whether the factors involved included poor business judgment, such as the $350 million lost in less than a year by Hiram Walker Consumers Home Limited investing in oil properties in the United States?

Senator Olson: Yes, I think that is important, because, apart from Hiram Walker, there were several dozen Canadian investors who learned that rather hard investment lesson as well.

Senator Balfour: Perhaps the minister, in obtaining answers, could also identify the motive which led Canadian companies to invest in the United States in the first place.

Senator Olson: Of course. Obviously, part of their motive for investing in the United States was that they believed that international markets were going to track upwards or escalate further on the basis of the projections they had in their minds at the time. If they had, perhaps some of those investment decisions would not have been quite as bad as they turned out to be, when they found they were not getting the expected returns because the market was not marching along at that accelerated rate. That, of course, also happens to be the case in Canada, but my honourable friend does not mention that. That is one of the perils one runs into when making investments and paying at the front end on the basis of what is anticipated. Sometimes such investment decisions turn rather sour.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

FUNDING OF WORK-SHARING PROGRAMS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable colleagues, a few moments ago I addressed some questions to the minister who has just spoken, and he was more than kind to say that he would take notice of them and at some future date provide me with what answers he could obtain. However, there is one point of information for which I had intended to ask, and I would ask permission to ask the minister for it now.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Go ahead.

Senator Donahoe: The Minister of Employment and Immigration announced yesterday that he would double the funds allocated to the work-sharing program. In the interest of fairness, I wish to say that the work-sharing program is a government remedial program which seems to be having some measure of success. My question is and I would ask the minister to deal with it as he dealt with my other questions; that is, take it as notice and give me an answer at some future date: Can he confirm that funding for the work-sharing program will be taken from the Unemployment Insurance Fund?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe the Deputy Leader of the Government has that information with him and can give it right now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to my understanding with Senator Roblin last evening, I was asked to obtain some information on the questions he had asked along the same line. I have some of that information with me. While it may not fully answer the question put by Senator Donahoe, it will certainly be relevant. If I may, I would like to furnish the answer when we resume the debate on the bill relating to this matter. That will give honourable senators the opportunity not only to have information on this question, but to take it into account during the debate.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Delayed answers to questions. Are there no delayed answers to questions?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, we seem to be quite caught up in our list of questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You must be joking, because I have a whole list here.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: I just wanted to see if you were awake.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I do not wish to cause any undue delay, but there are questions on the Order Paper that have been there for two years and more without reply. May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government who is responsible on the government side for co-ordinating the efforts to obtain answers to these questions? Is it the President of the Privy Council, a civil servant in the Langevin Block, the Secretary of State or the Leader of the Government in the Senate? Who is it? Can the honourable senator give us the name of the person who is responsible for bringing these answers to us?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as far as I am aware, our practice is to refer the questions through the office of the Leader of the Government to the appropriate departments for answers. Therefore, the responsibility for questions not being answered has to be shared by us and, to the extent that the department has not given us the information, by it. Certainly, as far as I am aware, there is no single person who co-ordinates all the answers. If a question goes to the Leader of the Government, for example, then we attempt to obtain the answer through the office of the Leader of the Government from the particular department concerned. If the question is the responsibility of other ministers, I imagine they do likewise. If I am not right there, then I am sure that Senator Olson will correct me.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the deputy leader is correct. The general practice is that we follow-up on our own answers.

Senator Murray: I am referring to written questions.

Senator Olson: I understand. It may be that my honourable friend would like to identify some of these questions that are causing him a great deal of difficulty. If they are written questions on the Order Paper, then there is no problem because we can see them. But there are cases where members opposite believe that they have received a commitment that my office was taking the question as notice to supply some further information later. In most cases the machinery goes forward immediately, but there may be the odd case where there is not the same perception between the two parties, and an honourable senator is expecting a more complete answer. If my honourable friend would let me know about such cases which apply to my office, I shall be glad to attend to them.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Would the minister say that it is reasonable that a question which I put on the Order Paper last April, over one year ago now, asking who was responsible for the invitations to the various government functions relating to President Reagan's visit remains unanswered? Is there any reason why this question cannot be answered within 12 or 13 months?

Senator Olson: I would not like to give an opinion on the matter until I have read the question.

Senator Marshall: You have had enough time.

Senator Murray: That would be a good place for you to start.

Senator Olson: There may be other factors involved, but I shall have a look at it.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. R. James Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the same minister. On November 19, 1981, I put a very simple question to the minister concerning the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act. My question can be found on page 3042 of Senate Debates, and it reads as follows:

To put the question in very simple terms, would the honourable senator explain how the principles of equity have altered since the time the measures were put in place and the present time?

My honourable friend gave a very straightforward answer. He said:

Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and give a detailed answer.

When may I expect that detailed answer?

Senator Olson: That is one of those cases where I will make sure that my staff gives particular attention to the question. It may be that some of the reply involved in that question is in somewhat of a state of flux, and I am sure that my honourable friend probably knew that that would be one of the difficulties when he asked it. I can say that I did give that reply because I can recall it.

Senator Frith: All in all, that should teach me to keep my mouth shut.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, compared to mine, the complaints by my colleagues on this side of the house are not as serious. I have a question which is dated October 30, 1980. Senator Olson's response to me was:

—I will have a look at that and see if there is some more expanded and detailed answer that I can bring to him.

I have received no response.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I had a look at my answer and decided I had given a complete and comprehensive answer in the first place.

Senator Flynn: That would be an accident.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, even Senator Olson, upon reading the answer which he gave, will know that the topic needs further expansion. He recognized this fact at the time. The comments can be found on page 1043 of Hansard.

Senator Marshall: Mark it down.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

E.G. KLEIN LIMITED—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Third reading of the Bill S-26, intituled: "An Act to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act".
(Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I merely wish to repeat what Senator Asselin said yesterday, namely, that he intended to speak on third reading of Bill S-26. Is it going to be tomorrow or next week?

Hon. Martial Asselin: I shall see. As soon as possible, in any case, but I am not ready today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Leblanc, I move that the order stand until the next sitting of the Senate.

Order stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-114, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 2).

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, with your indulgence, I would like to spend approximately an hour or two on this subject, so I hope you will not get bored.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: They are already leaving!

Senator Muir: Ah, wee Davey!

I do not know how I shall tie what I am about to say in with what has been said in the chamber earlier today, but with the indulgence of honourable senators—and I am sure that they will be very kind to me, as they always are and as I am to them—I would like to say a few words on a subject raised by Senator Donahoe. The honourable senator, very modestly, did not say that in 1970 he also had the honour of becoming a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great. I just thought I would bring that to the attention of honourable senators.

Upon looking over the parliamentary bible, as we call it—and it is not the Douay version, the King James Version or the Revised Standard Version—I note that Senator Donahoe is also a member of the Royal Caledonian Association of Scotland. How someone with a name like the Honourable Richard Alphonsus Donahoe, Q.C., B.A., LL.B., LL.D., K.S.G. can be a member of the Royal Caledonian Association of Scotland is beyond me.

● (1450)

I am a bit jealous of Senator Donahoe because I was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, but they threw me out of there when I was a year-and-a-half old because I could not compete with the Scots. I have done a little better here.

I should like also to align myself with the words uttered by the Honourable Senator Guay—Sir Joseph Guay. Little did I know that I had been associating all these years with such distinguished people.

I should also like to pay my tribute to the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle.

I happen to belong to an order that calls me "Sir Knight" in certain quarters, but I do not think I will ever have this order bestowed upon me. Although His Holiness Pope John Paul II spent some time in Edinburgh the other day, I have not received a telephone call, a letter or wire indicating that I will have that honour bestowed upon me.

Senator Steuart: Put in an application.

Hon. David Walker: Are you taking them?

Senator Muir: All joking aside, I sincerely congratulate Senator Bélisle and join with all of you in saying a few kind words about Senator Guay, Senator Donahoe and all other honourable senators who may have had other honours bestowed upon them.

In any event, I have an honorary degree from the only Gaelic college in North America, the Gaelic college on Cape Breton Island.

Now that we are giving jobs to those who already have jobs—it is not the government that is doing that but the church—I should like to try to tie that in with Bill C-114. The Honourable Senator Frith said last evening that the kind of legislation we have before us, Bill C-114, is what is generally known as a housekeeping bill. I never did like housekeeping. I do not know how the females feel about that, but I never did like washing ceilings or anything like that. So, I do not appreciate this bill too much, but I appreciate what it will do. However, it is by no means a solution. As I say, since housekeeping, in its many varieties, is, to say the least, unpalatable, I do not plan to spend too much time on this bill. I was only joking; I am not really going to spend an hour or so on this. Someone said, "Thank God!"

Bill C-114 simply extends from June 1982 to June 1983 the termination date for that portion of subsection 17(6) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

You may ask why we would want to do that. Well, as was explained by the Honourable Senator Frith last evening, that is the subsection which established the variable entrance requirement for eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

"What is so important about having a variable entrance requirement?" someone may persist in asking. The answer is simply that it favours a region such as mine, and anything that is good for Cape Breton has got to be good—period. A worker must have worked a certain number of weeks before being eligible for UI benefits. Some years ago that number of weeks was the same, regardless of where one lived and regardless of the unemployment rate. As I have said, that was changed in order to give areas such as Cape Breton Island and other parts of Nova Scotia, as well as other areas of the country, a break. The government instituted the variable entrance requirement—yet another wholesome idea borrowed from the Progressive Conservative Party.

Depending on the rate of unemployment, a worker must have worked anywhere from 10 to 14 weeks in order to qualify for financial assistance. This means that in an area experiencing high unemployment, such as la belle province and the Atlantic provinces, including Cape Breton Island and the province of Newfoundland, where it is shocking, the minimum of 10 weeks is required.

In other areas where unemployment is less acute, as you are well aware, the employment requirement is 14 weeks. The rationale behind this is that if there are more jobs available there is more opportunity and less reason for someone to be unemployed.

The higher entrance requirements apply to repeaters, so no one need be concerned that we are encouraging professional unemployment.

I thought the measure was good, honourable senators, when first conceived by the members of my party. I congratulated the government when finally it implemented our suggestion. I support the government now in its quest to see the measure prolonged.

It is sad that we have to have measures of this type, but the fact of the matter is that the scourge of unemployment does not descend evenly across the country, nor does anyone want to see that occur. I must point out that we in Cape Breton and the eastern part of Canada are fully aware that the outside world is suffering from this problem more than it used to. By the "outside world" I mean the province of Ontario, the province of Alberta and the rest of western Canada. They are suffering more now than they have in the past, and that is unfortunate, because many, many times, to our regret, thousands and thousands of people left the Atlantic region to go to Ontario and, in later years, to Alberta, and did well. In fact, the "Old Chief"—and that is a respectful reference to the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker—when reminiscing and talking about—where is Senator Steuart; he should be listening to this, but he will read it tomorrow, in any event—the church leaders and the leaders of the judiciary in the west, would say that they came from La Nouvelle-Écosse, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island; that they, as younger men, had to remove themselves to where they could find employment; and that they had progressed very well in the west.

Despite what I have said, you are not going to find any of us revelling in the thought that "Upper Canadians," to use that old cliché, are getting a taste of what contemporary misery can be like. No one is going to be joyful or happy about that. No, we sympathize with all those able-bodied and able-minded people across Canada who cannot find a useful outlet for their skills and their talents. We sincerely hope that they are fighting mad about this deplorable situation, and that they have not bought all this baloney fed to them by the central government to the effect that the problem is one over which this country has no control that is espoused daily by the Minister of State for Regional and Economic Expansion—or Industrial Expansion; whatever he is going to be minister of when the legislation is finally put through. That will not, I am sure, change his answers, because Senator Olson is a past master at answering questions and saying nothing. The only one who could do better than him, in the 25 years I have been on the Hill, was the Honourable Paul Martin, and he really was a past master.

● (1500)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is that fair to Senator Perrault?

Senator Muir: Maybe he was tutored by the Honourable Paul Martin.

Whatever government is in power in Canada today would have great difficulty, but I do think the present administration could do a lot more to assist the unemployed, other than this little housekeeping chore we are doing today. There are so many things that have to be done in this country, and there are so many things they could do other than just blaming it on "Reaganomics," other parts of the world and, as I said the other day, the weather—"God was not good to us, because he did not let it rain!" It is bad for the farmers and we blame God, and we put the blame on this one and that one. We do not, but the government does, and why I do not know, because I always found in election campaigns, when I used to run and be elected to the other place, that the Liberal Party always had the answers, but when they gained power they did not put them into effect.

The Deputy Leader of the Government knows I am speaking the truth when I say that it is a difficult time for any government. I think the present administration could do a lot more than they are doing to create more employment, rather than just extend the provisions of the act. And don't get me wrong; thank God for it; it is going to help some people buy groceries and pay the rent. But there is one thing we could do away with, and that is government waste, as has been mentioned by other honourable senators.

The other point I want to make is, why in the world was Bill C-114 dealt with in the other place last Friday, and then brought in here in a great big rush? As Senator Asselin asked yesterday, "Why do we get the bill so late?" I do not think anyone answered him, but that seems to be the way it happens; it is nothing new. The Honourable Lloyd Axworthy knew that it had to be extended. I believe the deadline is June 4. Today is June 2. Therefore, it should have been brought in long before now and put in place.

Frankly, I think government waste is at the root of many of our economic problems. Government waste has been fought in a way that exacerbates our unemployment problem, which has been serious for a long time. I repeat that government waste cannot be blamed on international conditions. You cannot blame the Bundesrat, or the Congress, or even the Kremlin for what is happening here. We have the greatest country in the world, with immense resources, including vast mineral wealth, and with the proper guidance and a little more effort this government could do better in trying to get people back to work.

Hon. R. James Balfour: It couldn't do much worse.

Senator Muir: As Senator Balfour says, it couldn't do much worse. I hate to turn on the television news because there is always mention of many more workers being laid off. The old gimmick of, "Well, they don't want to work," that's a lot of phooey, for the love of Mike! Every weekend I am deluged with calls from people who are going to Canada Employment Centres looking for work. Regrettably, there are no jobs for those people. I receive so many letters from unemployed people asking if I can get them a job. I don't call judges to try to get jobs for them, or anything of that nature, but I will call anywhere—any office, any government office or any employment office—to try to find work for these people.

I was listening to a talk show on the radio this morning, and so many people were calling in and saying, "Well, people don't want to work. If they wanted to work, they could find jobs." That may be so, to a certain extent, in what I term "Disney World North"—Ottawa, where you see cranes everywhere, with so much construction going on that you have the impression that everything is booming. Perhaps some people can get work here, but I can give you list upon list of names of men and women who faithfully make their visits to Canada Employment Centres looking for work, without success. These are not the type of people who say, "Oh, I push a pencil this way, and I don't want that job because I have to push it the other way." We do have people of that type; but we also have a lot of good, sincere people—the vast majority—in Canada who are willing to work, and work at anything, if they get the opportunity. We do have a small minority who, unfortunately, consider themselves in a certain category and will not take any other type of position.

I grew up in an area where, when you had a job opportunity, you took it. You couldn't care less what that job was. As I look around this chamber, I see quite a number of honourable senators from those areas, and they did the same thing; they were not fussy. The important thing was to have a job. I have seen people who had to go out to work in order to bring up their families, and they took any kind of job. We are very proud of those kinds of people.

I will not detain you any longer. I only want to say that this bill seeks to extend a useful provision. It is not the ultimate solution to the problem, but it does deserve support—as does the idea that this country could use a new, better, more capable, more ambitious, more sincere, more earnest and more trustworthy government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-114.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there were three interventions on this bill apart from my own—one by Senator Godfrey by way of a question; one by Senator Roblin by way of a question; and one by Senator Muir that we have just heard, which was somewhat longer.

With respect to Senator Godfrey's question, I want to make it perfectly clear on the record what his concern was. His concern arose out of section 28A of the Statutory Instruments Act. I believe we can deal with the matter expeditiously because Senator Godfrey looked into it further himself and has clarified the issue, and I thank him for that.

His concern was that in section 28A(1) there is a definition of the expression "subject to affirmative resolution of Parliament." It then says that that has to be interpreted and implemented "in accordance with the rules of those Houses". As Senator Godfrey pointed out, his concern was that, as far as he knew, neither house, and certainly not our house, had any rule on that subject.

When I referred to the negative resolution yesterday, Senator Flynn, quite rightly, pointed out that Senator Godfrey was referring to the affirmative resolution. I acknowledge that there is an important difference.

The concern shown with respect to some of the energy bills and some other bills on the question of negative resolutions simply does not apply in the case of an affirmative resolution because, in that case, normally there is a procedure by which the government may introduce the resolution. The problem arises with the introduction of a negative resolution.

The second intervention by way of question and commentary was by Senator Roblin. I undertook to try to bring some information on a series of questions he had asked earlier. He asked the following questions: What is the status of the Unemployment Insurance Account given the current high levels of unemployment? That is quite close to Senator Donahoe's question. What sums are in the government's estimates for these new programs—that is, work sharing? This was also referred to by Senator Donahoe. He then asked about job creation, and: What is the statutory authority for these programs?

Honourable senators, my information on the question of the status is that it is too early to speculate on the year-end status of the UI account and on premium rate levels for 1983. While the current unemployment level is higher than that forecast in October 1981—the time at which the 1982 premium rate was set—it is likely that the account could find itself in a deficit position at the end of the 1982 calendar year. The premium rate for 1983 will be set in the fall of this year, and will take into account the actual level of unemployment experienced during 1982 and, among other factors, the expected rate for 1983. It should be noted that the account was in a cumulative surplus position of about $320 million at the end of 1981.

Dealing with the sums in the government's estimates, honourable senators, I am informed that no additional sums are in the main estimates for work sharing of UI job creation programs since the proposals for these programs were presented after the estimates were closed; in any case, none would be required for work-sharing benefits which are financed entirely by ER/EE premiums. By way of example, a $90 million work-sharing program would have an impact of about $45 million on the UI account which would be equivalent, in terms of the employee premium rate, to about 1¼ cents per $100 of insured earnings. It should be noted that the premium rate for employees was lowered in 1982 by 15 cents per $100 of insured earnings.

On the third question regarding statutory authority, sections 37 and 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act provide the statutory authority to operate programs of work sharing and programs of UI job creation, respectively.

Honourable senators, just to tighten the focus, as Senator Roblin did, on a certain aspect of those questions, I asked for some further information. On the subject of work sharing, while the limit on work sharing for 1982—and these are the figures I asked about specifically—is now $190 million and that for job creation $85 million, the substance of the answer I have just given still applies. Honourable senators may wish an opportunity to study this answer when it is printed in the Debates of the Senate. The government has already announced that the work-sharing program will be extended to May 1983, and the expenditure ceiling for 1983 has been set at $150 million.

I felt that Senator Roblin was particularly concerned about the question of whether the government has appropriated new funds from the Consolidated Revenue Fund to pay for work sharing and job creation because his question was: Where does the government plan to get that money?

My information is that there has not been an appropriation of new funds from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Under the provisions of sections 37 and 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, legislative authority exists for the commission to have work-sharing and job-creation programs or projects through which unemployment insurance benefits are paid to participating individuals. Costs associated with these projects are paid for through the normal financing mechanisms of the programs—that is, the premium contributions by employers and employees and a government share according to a presently established formula set out in the legislation.

Honourable senators, that may or may not be all the information that Senator Roblin and Senator Donahoe want, but perhaps it may give them an opportunity to again sharpen the focus on their questions because I understand that is more information than they had as of last night.

Honourable senators, in response to the third intervention by Senator Muir, who described this bill as a housekeeping bill—and in a sense he is quite right, although I did not use that expression—it is, of course, housekeeping in the sense that it is a technical necessity to continue the present program. As he pointed out, the whole problem of unemployment is a much larger problem than mere housekeeping.

[Senator Frith.]

I would compliment Senator Muir and support his accurate analysis of the VER. He applied it to his particular region.

Honourable senators will remember that yesterday I said that the purpose of VER was to tailor or adjust regional unemployment rates to the entry requirements. Senator Muir then pointed out that the formula is especially necessary everywhere east of the Ottawa River and, from his own experience, that it is particularly valuable in his area.

On the question of the political problem—and that is “political” with a small “p”—facing our country arising out of economic conditions and the rate of unemployment in the country, which is unacceptably high to everyone, I do not wish to brush aside his intervention in any way, but I do mention that we will shortly be receiving Bill C-115 which deals with the training program. The debate on that bill, as well as the debate on Senator Phillips’ motion, may be opportune occasions for proper discussion of unemployment problems.

Senator Muir mentioned that we should do more than simply introduce a housekeeping bill, and I totally agree with him. It is my opinion that the government has done a great deal more than simply introduce this bill on the subject of unemployment. I do not think that the government, the opposition, or any Canadian will be satisfied until the results are more impressive than they have been, but I believe it is fair to say, and I think honourable senators will agree, that the government has come forward with some programs related to unemployment, some of them quite recently. I think we will have a further opportunity to debate the issue more fully when these other bills come forward, and in the debate on Senator Phillip’s motion. Perhaps we can apply Senator Muir’s observations, as they say, mutatis mutandis to the debate at that time. I am not suggesting, however, that he should feel foreclosed from intervening at a later date.

With reference to my honourable friend’s job performance rating of Senators Olson, Austin and Perrault, I know that he will understand that I, of course, would rate their performances in a manner different from his. I do not intend to do any similar job performance rating on his colleagues.

Regarding the issue of government waste, certainly there is no question of the economic importance of deficits and that government waste contributes to deficits. I know that Senator Muir is a merciless critic of government waste. I can only tell him quite sincerely that he has allies on this side of the chamber, and throughout the government, who have the same objective, namely, to cut government waste.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Has Senator Perrault given you permission to make that kind of admission?

Senator Frith: My answer is: No, he neither gave nor denied such permission.

Senator Roblin: Am I allowed to congratulate you on that one?

Senator Frith: Thank you. As to why we got the bill so late, honourable senators, I can only say that this is a recurring phenomenon here. I know that Senator Muir, as a former member of the House of Commons, realizes that the legislative program in the other place is such that it is not always easy to pass a piece of legislation at the time it was expected to be passed. In this particular case, it was not at all a matter of obstruction by the opposition, because there was none. It was simply a matter of a legislative log jam in the House of Commons.

Perhaps this is an unnecessary and gratuitous comment, but, in my view as an observer, one of the contributing factors to such log jams in the other place is their rules of procedure, which are much more complicated than ours. I think we can occasionally take a moment to congratulate ourselves on our relatively simple, straightforward rules of procedure which, because they are so simple, are seldom, if ever, abused.

That is all I can say, honourable senators, about the time factor. I can only answer for the government in the Senate. I believe that both Senator Muir and Senator Asselin would agree that, as far as the Senate is concerned, we got the bill before the Senate very soon after it was passed in the other place.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on second reading. I commend this bill to your favourable consideration.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask one question?

Senator Frith: Yes, certainly.

Senator Muir: I agree that there are times in the other place when it is difficult to pass legislation. Is the Deputy Leader of the Government aware that there are certain people in the other place who will do their damndest, if I may use that word, to stall legislation, regardless of the political stripe of those in power? Then, having done their utmost to delay a bill, they will rush it to the Senate, only to turn around and condemn honourable senators because they have not put sufficient time into the study of it. These are the same people who stress the urgency of getting the bill through and assented to. These are the same characters who sit around, in their hypocritical way, and say, "We have to do away with that place over there. We should get rid of that bunch of dummies," notwithstanding the fact that there are, in this chamber, former premiers, cabinet ministers, and representatives from all walks of life.

Although I feel that the deputy leader is aware of this, I thought I would draw his attention to the fact that there are types in the other place who are quick to stall and delay legislation, only to criticize the Senate for spending any time on it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I cannot, from my own direct, personal experience, attest to what Senator Muir has said. I have, however, experienced the results of what he has diagnosed as the cause of such delays. I have heard it said, by people whose judgment I respect, that what he says is so.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave, today, although it is not necessary that it be read the third time today. If honourable senators grant third reading, we would plan to have royal assent for this and a few other bills that have been accumulated tomorrow. In any event, we would not be having royal assent until tomorrow, and could have third reading of this bill tomorrow as well.

Senator Flynn: If my honourable friends had arranged for royal assent today, we would have been only too pleased to accommodate them. Wednesday is a very nice day to have royal assent, especially when His Honour invites us to meet with the Deputy of His Excellency. Since it is already arranged for the Deputy Governor General to come tomorrow, I think we might as well leave the third reading of this bill for one more day.

Senator Frith: In quick reply to what Senator Flynn has said, I agree that he is quite right. I ought to have asked him about it and we could have had royal assent today.

On motion of Senator Frith, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill C-105, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in replying briefly to the comments made by Senator McIlraith in introducing Bill C-105, I wish to raise but a few questions that honourable senators might give some thought to in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, which is conducting a pre-study of this and various other energy-related bills, and to which, it is my understanding, this bill will eventually be referred.

As Senator McIlraith has explained, the bill appears to have set in it certain safeguards. This would not be the first time that members of my own profession—that is, the legal profession—accountants or other like-minded businessmen found some route around or some loophole. I have a concern that, while the bill appears to aim basically at energy and energy-related industries, it is still an amendment to the Canada Business Corporations Act, and can be used in relation to any corporation that meets various requirements.

On a personal note, while I am not against Canadianizing anything—I like to think that I am as patriotic as is any citizen of our country—I worry about the price that this country is paying in its great quest for Canadian ownership. I am not sure whether the billions of dollars that are spent to acquire Canadian ownership are producing one extra drop of oil or, for that matter, are employing one extra Canadian. Last year alone, we spent almost twice the amount of money making acquisitions with an end to Canadianizing the industry than we spent on exploration and development in the energy field. My understanding is, according to the last figures I saw, that we had spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7 billion for acquisitions, and some $4 billion—not quite two to one—for exploration and development.

I think the committee ought to review this rather great exception that is being made to what lawyers might call the general corporate law of the land. My understanding is that there are certain regulatory bodies, such as the Ontario Securities Commission, that have expressed some concern about the buy-back provisions that are set out in this act and amendments thereto, and I trust that the committee will be looking at the concerns expressed by them. I am not standing here in order to present their case; it is just that they are a body that is concerned ultimately with shareholders, or consumers, or, if you like, the guys at the end of the rope. I guess their concern is that some people ought not to be victimized by this or any other piece of legislation, and that concern ought to be looked at.

There is another concern. If, for instance, there is built-in protection for ownership, what happens if one of these companies becomes amalgamated—what used to be called merged—and new shares are issued? These would be of the restrained type which allow for buy-back. I am not satisfied that the bill adequately deals with that problem, and what I fear could be an abuse of that.

More than anything else I trust the committee will concern itself with the kind of uncertainty that these provisions seem to carry with them, and the investment of foreign owners of shares is terribly uncertain, since they can be confiscated. In what is already an uncertain economy, this is an added uncertainty.

I trust the committee will also concern itself with other issues. Senator McIlraith's comments last night were excellent—they were brief, to the point, and I understood them—but they dealt specifically with the energy industry. Senator Lang raised the question at the conclusion of Senator McIlraith's comments with regard to whether or not we really need this bill, and the reaction was that it is needed for the Canadianization of the energy industry. It is not limited to the energy industry. There is a vast number of other kinds of industry, such as the insurance industry, which might have a tremendous amount of foreign ownership, which, if removed, may throw us into some terrible difficulties. Many industries are federally incorporated, and could be, or are, subject to the changes we are talking about.

Another question comes to mind. Part of section 43.1(1) of the act—I am now quoting just a couple of lines—reads as follows:

—in order to assist the corporation or any of its affiliates or associates to qualify under any prescribed law of Canada or a province to receive licences, permits—

The question that this raises, putting it bluntly, is this. Last night we heard Senator Doody talk about a very extreme case of trampling on provincial rights. I am not satisfied that we are not in some small way—and it is awfully small compared to the Hibernia problem—interfering through this bill with provincial rights. Does this mean that this law will apply to provincially incorporated companies? I am not satisfied, upon reading the amendment, that I have the answer to that.

There is also the concern, which I am sure will become obvious to most members of the committee, about the traditional role of the director. What is a director? He is a person elected by the shareholders to give direction to the management of the company, to set policy, and to protect the shareholders' interests. This is the person who is intended to protect the shareholders' interests, but who can, in effect, for some purpose, albeit a purpose set out in the act, move to buy back the shares of that investor. What I say it does is attack, somewhat, the trustee relationship that a director is in.

I think, from a general law point of view, that this ought to raise some concerns. I do not want to sound alarmist and suggest that this would happen everywhere, but I know the reaction that Canadians have when some other country nationalizes an industry that has great Canadian ownership. We all get terribly upset. We call some of these countries banana republics. They just nationalize an industry and pay what they think they ought to pay. I am not for a moment suggesting that we are approaching that kind of situation, but certainly there is a similarity.

Day in and day out, when questions are asked from this side of the house, Senator Olson describes the world situation. Just the other day I heard him say that Canada is part of the world. Why are we dealing ourselves out, then? Why are we saying that we don't want, to use that awful word, foreigners? I am not sure that from time to time this country does not need foreign investments. It would be wonderful, of course, if another million Canadians were working, and if we could own the oil industry, and everything else. I would say, "Count me in." But that is not the reality of today. I say that we ought to be looking at these sorts of things.

I do not think every country is going to rush out and bring in reciprocal legislation that will ban Canadians. Some may. Our friends south of the border are rattling sabres and saying they may do some nasty things.

Honourable senators, as I have said, if we had less of an unemployment problem, if we had a healthy economy and a healthy resource industry, I think my concerns would be less. In any event, I trust that these and other matters will be considered by the committee.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator McIlraith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz has raised several points, some of which it would be possible to answer now, except that, as I indicated at the very opening of my remarks in presenting the bill for the consideration of the Senate, while the points at issue are fairly simple and direct, in terms of the kind of powers being sought, the actual clauses of the bill are quite complex and long, so that they will probably be much better dealt with in committee. For example, in speaking about buying back shares, that power is severely limited, and is to be used only in the case where there has been a departure from the restraints placed on the sale of the shares. Those are very technical questions.

I would think, rather than trying to debate or argue what the bill does or does not do in those technical ways at this point, I would do better simply to conclude my remarks and, if and when the bill gets second reading, move that it be referred to committee for study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY MONITORING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Bosa for second reading of Bill C-106, respecting energy monitoring and to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, you will be immediately relieved to know that I intend to be exceedingly brief. Last night I listened to the exposition on this bill given by Senator Bosa. His speech was comprehensive, well timed, and showed an insight into the bill's provisions. However, it did not necessarily convince me that everything was perfect in the best of all worlds because we are asked to pass this bill. There were certain clauses, particularly those numbered in the thirties, which gave rise to much thought.

I have since read the bill and have reached the conclusion that it is one which is certainly susceptible to improvement. It occurred to me, therefore, that I should adopt the position taken by Senator McIlraith when moving a recent motion. He felt that what was to be said on the bill could be said more profitably after the bill had been vetted and refined in the crucible of the appropriate committee. I adopt a similar attitude. So long as I am assured by those responsible on the other side of the house that the bill will be so referred, and that on its return to this chamber we will be given an opportunity to debate it further on third reading, then I am prepared to agree to its being passed on second reading.

It is my hope and confident expectation that there will be improvements made to the bill, and that when it does return, while it may not be a bill to excite or enthuse one, it may still be a bill of which a realist such as myself can say, "We can accept it, we will allow it to pass, because we know that those on the other side are going to pass it anyway, but we will have the conviction and the satisfaction of knowing that we have done our best to improve it insofar as it is capable of improvement."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give the honourable senator the assurance he has asked for with the reference to this bill being referred to the appropriate committee. That, pursuant to our rules, is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PETRO-CANADA ACT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for second reading of Bill C-101, to amend the Petro-Canada Act.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, in rising to offer a few remarks with respect to the amendments to the Petro-Canada Act, as embodied in Bill C-101, I wish first to take the opportunity to set the record straight with respect to the attitude and policy of the Progressive Conservative Party concerning Petro-Canada.

I am motivated to do this as a result of a comment made last evening during Question Period by the Minister of State for Economic Development, in which he stated as a fact that the policy of the Progressive Conservative Party was, to use his words, "to phase out" Petro-Canada. That statement is totally incorrect.

In the middle of October 1979 Prime Minister Clark tabled in the other place the report of the task force he had appointed concerning the reorganization and privatization of Petro-Canada. Under this proposal, a privatized Petro-Canada would have had almost all of the assets and responsibilities the government-owned Petro-Canada now has; but it would have been restructured financially, its management would have been reorganized, and it would have been strengthened to a degree that would have enabled it to play a far more important role than it now does in Canada's energy industry.

The task force report proposed methods for identifying the components of Petro-Canada that are essentially commercial in nature and the components that relate clearly to the direct responsibilities of government.

The commercial components would, over time, have been transferred to Canadian shareholders, and that would have accounted for about 97 per cent of the assets of the government-owned Petro-Canada.

Clearly, the idea of privatizing Petro-Canada did not involve dismantling it, scrapping it, phasing it out, or weakening it. Nor was it a give-away. What was proposed was to transfer shares representing ownership of essentially the same assets to essentially the same people who, as citizens, already own the company anyway, but regrettably in a form and structure which guarantees over time the creation of another huge bureaucracy to manage and control it.

The responsibilities of such a private sector company, as we proposed, would have included the costly, but, in the long run, profitable task of frontier exploration and development. The Clark government saw frontier activity, along with oil sands development and other high-risk but essential investments, as primarily the job of the private sector companies already operating in Canada, and especially of the new privatized Petro-Canada.

This may be news to Senator Olson and his colleagues in the Trudeau government, because when they read the task force report, if indeed they read it at all, they apparently did not understand, or chose not to understand, what it said.

Whether deliberately or carelessly, they have fostered the false impression that the Clark government proposed to turn the profitable parts of Petro-Canada over to the private sector and leave the money-losing parts in the public sector.

The small part of Petro-Canada that it was proposed would remain in the public sector would have handled state-to-state oil import negotiations, if and when necessary, it would have had research responsibilities, and, perhaps most important of all, would have promoted increased exploration and especially increased Canadian private sector participation in frontier and offshore exploration areas.

The Clark government, upon taking office, felt it was duty-bound to make changes in Petro-Canada in order to improve its efficiency and make it clearly accountable for its actions. The existing mix of commercial and public policy responsibilities makes it impossible for any government, for Parliament, and for taxpayers, to determine whether money and effort are being effectively and efficiently deployed.

I suppose, honourable senators, that what is fundamentally at issue here is a divergence in view between those people who want big government to get bigger still and those of us who see the greatest opportunity for freedom, diversity and economic opportunity in encouraging private sector initiative and growth.

● (1550)

There is a growing, strong belief that government should stay out of, or remove itself from, those activities that private individuals and enterprises can do better. And that really is what the Petro-Canada debate boils down to. A soundly financed, better organized and privatized Petro-Canada would be a more effective, more active, more productive company and a stronger Canadian voice in our energy industry than the state-owned corporate entity that we are discussing today.

The bill we are now considering, honourable senators, provides for a massive increase in the authorized capital of

[Senator Balfour.]

Petro-Canada to the tune of about $5 billion. When these taxpayers' funds are deployed, that will mean that the taxpayers of Canada will have provided $5 billion of treasury funds which will not then be available for other purposes, such as, for example, assisting universities, assisting hospitals, providing for research and development, providing for national defence, and providing for all those other federal government expenditures which most of us would regard as comprising the normal and legitimate sphere of activity of a national government.

In the process, the Government of Canada will, using taxpayers' dollars, enter into direct competition with private sector retail gasoline outlets owned and, in many cases, operated by Canadian small businessmen. I would be grateful indeed if one of the honourable senators opposite could explain to me how competing at the retail gasoline level will contribute in any manner to what is supposed to be our fundamental energy policy goal—self-sufficiency by 1990.

The obvious fact is, honourable senators, that the entire National Energy Program of Mr. Lalonde, of which this bill before us is a component, is in a shambles. Unfortunately for all Canadians, there is little prospect that the fundamental changes in policy, so desperately needed to restore vigour to the energy industry, will come about until this government is thrown out of office—an event which, I might add, cannot happen soon enough for the overwhelming majority of the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Balfour: I look forward, honourable senators, to having an opportunity to discuss further the details of this legislation when it is before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Balfour, for Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill S-27, to amend the Act of incorporation of The Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, in the midst of dealing with important energy bills and other incidental pieces of legislation—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Accidental pieces of legislation.

Senator Buckwold: —nevertheless, Bill S-27, in the eyes of many people, is of considerable importance. Let me just give you a little of the background of the organization known as the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada.

The incorporation of this society, referred to as the B.P.O. Elks of Canada, came about because of an interest shown by a group of worthy citizens of Vancouver, who, as a result of an investigation of the American order, established the B.P.O. Elks of Canada in Vancouver in September 1912. The organization was then incorporated by an Act of Parliament in 1913. It is the 1913 act, honourable senators, to which some minor amendments are being proposed today.

This fraternal organization moved rapidly across Canada and was soon established from the west to the east, including Newfoundland. From the outset, the Elks order dedicated its actions to, and encouraged its members to work with and in the interest of, children in each and every community in which an Elks' lodge was established. The organization was established with a family approach to membership, and an auxiliary to the Elks known as the Order of the Royal Purple was well in place by 1915, operating as a subordinate branch. That auxiliary has continuously had a major influence on the charitable works for which the Elks have habitually been known.

In special times of stress, and during wars, the membership has always shown deep concern for those in conflict and has established special projects to assist in raising funds and in providing comfort.

Prior to 1956 the organization did not have its own national charity, and in the early years supported the Canadian Save the Children Fund. However, at the 1956 national convention of the B.P.O. Elks and their auxiliary, the Order of the Royal Purple, held in Sherbrooke, Quebec, a resolution was put forward to establish a nationally registered charity, sponsored by both orders jointly and named The Elks Purple Cross Fund. That fund was established for the purpose of providing financial assistance to any child in need, for any purpose whatsoever, when such assistance was not available from any other source. The original age limit was age 16, but the age was later amended so that any child up to the 19th birthday could be assisted.

In 1965 a special committee was formed to study ways and means of extending the services of the fund beyond the general assistance approach by providing special help to some particular area of need which had not had significant support up to that time. The committee appointed for that purpose made many inquiries and surveys of need and, upon the recommendation of a well-known and highly respected otolaryngologist in the city of Regina, the decision was reached to establish a program to promote the best possible services for the Canadian hearing-impaired child.

Because the major area of concern was to bring about early identification of hearing loss, an ancillary division was added to the Elks Purple Cross Fund to be known as the Elks Purple Cross Deaf Detection and Development Program. That program was to provide funds to purchase special diagnostic equipment, to establish public-awareness programs, to assist in the development of special training projects and programs in association with universities, and to finance special symposiums and conferences to bring together top specialists in the fields of hearing and speech so that their knowledge could be shared and published for the purpose of making better programs available.

As a result of the efforts of the B.P.O. Elks and their auxiliary, the Order of the Royal Purple, and in co-operation with other government and health agencies, many major programs exist in Canada today that were not in place just 15 years ago. That accomplishment has required a great deal of money. The fund has expended in excess of $4 million in this health area, and all of that money has been raised by fund-raising projects and through voluntary contributions by the members.

While all this has taken place, the Elks have also built and maintained many community halls, children's playgrounds, swimming pools and ice arenas, and have continued to work for the general good and welfare of over 350 communities across Canada in which their branches are established.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the legislation now before Parliament is to remove the restriction limiting to $100,000 the value of real property which might be acquired by the society or any of its branches. This restriction was incorporated into the act in 1913. In view of the increase in prices generally and of land in particular since that date, it is no longer realistic. Indeed, the origins of the restriction are not entirely clear, although it seems to have been the practice to place such restrictions on branch holdings of other societies incorporated by Parliament at that time.

● (1600)

The second purpose of the bill is to enable the society to change its head office. The head office was established at Vancouver in the original act, where it remained from 1913 until 1921. Thereafter, the head office was located in London, Ontario, between 1921 and 1923; in Calgary, Alberta, between 1923 and 1931; and in Winnipeg, Manitoba, between 1931 and 1975. From January 1, 1976 to date, the head office has been in Regina, Saskatchewan.

The bill also substitutes French wording for English names and expressions used in the French version of the original act.

Honourable senators, I have given the background of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the ladies' organization known as the Royal Purple. I have tried to indicate to you the importance of this fraternal group across Canada, and I am sure you will be interested in knowing that there are 360 lodges founded throughout all the provinces of Canada and that there are 61,000 members, plus an additional 17,000 members in its ladies' auxiliary. I suggest that the bill does not particularly need committee study, and I have discussed this matter with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

As I say, there are really two changes to the act of incorporation: one as to the value of property that could be owned; and the other as to the location of the head office. I ask for your support because this is a very worthy organization which, along with other fraternal and charitable organizations across this country, has done so much in the voluntary field for the people of Canada who need that kind of assistance.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I was wondering whether the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate would consent to having the bill read the third time at the next sitting, rather than wait until the following week.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I believe the bill has to go to committee. It would be irregular not to refer it, unless there is unanimous consent.

Senator Buckwold: That is fine with me. I have discussed the matter with Senator Roblin, who felt that, in view—

Senator Flynn: But the rule is that a private bill of this kind must go to committee. I think it would be safer to observe the rule, unless you have a very good reason for speeding things up.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, in that case, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study and report.

Senator Flynn: That is a very good committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we go any further, I would like to say to my honourable friend who introduced the motion that I hope I have not derailed his program on account of any discussions we had between us. Obviously, I neglected to consult the rules on this particular matter. I do hope my honourable friend is not inconvenienced.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you, Senator Roblin. I am sure the Elks will survive, having done so since 1913. What I was trying to do was not so much hustle the bill through but to make it a little easier on the committee and the chamber, in view of the large volume of work that is currently before those bodies.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: May I ask the honourable senator whether I have to check first to determine whether any members of my committee are Elks?

Senator Flynn: There may be some who look like elks.
Motion agreed to.

JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA— MOTION NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off

Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, as a member of this house from the province of Newfoundland, I feel it incumbent upon me to take issue with the mover of this motion and explain why I cannot support it. I shall be quite brief and in no way as eloquent as some previous speakers. I do not intend, nor do I need, to go into detail on the facts of this matter, as the Honourable Senator Perrault, in his excellent presentation on Thursday last, set them out clearly and accurately. I associate myself with the remarks made by Senator Perrault and agree with his conclusions. However, I would like to make brief mention of a few points.

It is clear that the questions of jurisdiction and ownership of the offshore region have been the subject of discussion between the federal government and the Province of Newfoundland for many years. In fact, I believe discussion on this matter took place between the federal and provincial governments as far back as 1965.

The position of the federal government has been consistent, since it is to the effect that, in its opinion, jurisdiction and ownership of the offshore are vested in the federal government, but the question of legal rights must eventually be determined by the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe all parties agree that this question can only be decided in that way.

There has been considerable negotiation between the governments involved over the years on both the legal and practical problems involved in the issue, with the result that in 1976 agreement was reached between the two governments for the placing of a joint submission before the Supreme Court to settle the question of jurisdiction and proprietary rights as regards the offshore. Unfortunately, for some reason the province changed its mind in this regard and such joint reference did not proceed, despite suggestions from the federal government that it should. If such reference had proceeded, the issue would in all probability have been resolved by now.

Apart from the legal issue, it appears that all parties hoped that pending such resolution some agreement for joint management could be arrived at between the two governments so that development in the area could proceed in an orderly fashion. This development has been and continues to be hindered by the lack of such an agreement. The situation is desperate and there is an urgent need to encourage further development to assist both the national and provincial economies.

It is to be noted that, with this in view, in July 1981 the federal government proposed to renew the discussion in an attempt to reach agreement on this issue of resource management and revenue sharing. It was made clear, however, because of the various effects the delays were causing, that the federal government wished to have these matters resolved by February 1982, after which the legal process would have to proceed. Renewed negotiations did follow, but the so-called negotiations proved fruitless and stalled at the end of January by reason of what the federal government claimed were pre-conditions set by the province.

Following this breakdown, in early February the province rushed to place the question of offshore resource ownership and jurisdiction before the Newfoundland Appeal Court. This issue covered the broad area of all the offshore waters surrounding Newfoundland. This will, of course, involve possible conflict with four other provinces, and also France in respect to the delicate situation regarding the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

● (1610)

The Government of Newfoundland claims that it took this step because of the attitude of the federal government in respect of the Seafarers' International Union appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal. However, it must be remembered that it was not the federal government which in that case raised the jurisdiction issue; it was the parties to the action themselves who raised the issue. The two governments were only intervenors.

The SIU case clearly illustrates the serious situation which can arise in regulating rights or relationships between third parties where this vital issue of jurisdiction has not been finally settled in our highest court.

To return to my point. In view of the deadline set by the federal government, and when one considers that certain preparations must have been made beforehand for the reference to the appeal court in advance of the ruling from the Federal Court of Appeal in the SIU case, it certainly appears that the object of the provincial government was to get, if I may use the expression, "the jump on the feds"—to get into court first and then cry foul against the other party when it proceeded as it had said it would proceed all along.

What followed was in keeping with the federal government's continued, stated policy. In order to get as quickly as possible the resolution of the question of ownership and jurisdiction, the federal government applied to the Supreme Court for a ruling. This reference is on the restricted question of ownership and jurisdiction as it applies to the restricted area known generally as Hibernia. This is the area in which development is most advanced and where resolution of these problems is most urgent.

I do not believe anyone questions the right of either government to proceed with either of these references. Previous speakers in this debate appear to have conceded this point. It is clear that the federal government can refer the matter directly to the Supreme Court of Canada, whilst the provincial government must refer the matter to the provincial supreme court. As I understand it, the criticism now being levelled at the federal government is on the grounds that it is an attempt by that government to usurp or bypass the pending proceedings in the Appeal Court of Newfoundland; and further, that such action is without precedent.

On this last point, in his presentation the Honourable Senator Perrault has shown that this is not so, since there appear to be ample instances of references by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada as a result of actions commenced in lower courts.

Generally, honourable senators—and I speak particularly to those who are lawyers—surely it is up to either party to a dispute, in an ordinary matter, to choose its own forum for adjudication. Provided there is jurisdiction, each party may choose a different court, and at the same time. Even more so when parties are restricted to a particular court and the issues, as in this case, are somewhat different. Surely, in such a situation it is up to the courts themselves to decide in which court the matter will be heard. As a lawyer myself, I have enough confidence in our courts to believe that this point will be resolved in due course. I am sure that the courts can look after themselves in this respect. I will make no further comment on that aspect at this time, as it is, I believe, already under consideration by a court.

I should like now to refer to the remarks made by the Honourable Senator Asselin in this debate, when he mentioned the apparent danger of contradictory judgments from different courts.

I am glad he mentioned it, because this is a situation which arises quite often in court proceedings. As the honourable senator has said, quite often one court will adjourn its proceedings pending the decision of another court on some point common to both cases. I should like to point out, however, that this is usually where a lower and a higher court are involved. The lower court would prefer to wait to see how and if it will be bound by the decision of the higher court. The matter of contradictory judgments is not the deciding principle. From my experience, conflicting judgments have caused no embarrassment to courts or judges. Quite often there will be conflicting judgments on similar points in courts in different parts of the country, and this appears to create no great problems.

Having said that, however, I must observe that the matter of the legality of the process has, in my understanding of this motion, not been questioned. In fact, the Honourable Senator Lang pointed out the exact legal authority for such actions by both governments. I think he referred to the specific statute under which each government has proceeded. From what he has said in moving this motion, I gather he does not take issue with the right of the federal government to take the steps it took, but rather deplores that it was done.

It is then purely a legal matter and each party has exercised the rights which are vested in it. How can anyone criticize that, unless they wish to use it for political purposes? It should be remembered also that it was the provincial government itself which initiated court proceedings on a question which the federal government, all along, has considered must be resolved in court. The outcome of these references is for the courts to decide. To talk about "the great Hibernia grab" is, of course, in itself an insult to the courts, as it is possibly a presumption or comment on the possible outcome of those references.

The suggestion has also been made by previous speakers that, in this process, the federal government is trying to politicize the courts. I suggest that the reverse is the case. The question of ownership and jurisdiction is purely a legal matter for the courts; management and revenue-sharing is surely a political matter to be decided between governments. I consider this motion itself an attempt to politicize the legal process.

Whilst the ownership and jurisdiction questions must, for many reasons, be settled, the real, overriding consideration is the matter of development, management and revenue-sharing. Whatever the outcome of these court references, these matters remain, and it is the people of the province who suffer by the lack of decision and action on them.

It is essential that, pending the outcome of the court references, agreement be reached in these matters. It is encouraging to see that, even since the launching of the court references, both governments have intimated that they want to get back to the bargaining table. Let's hope they do.

Before I close I should like to point out that there is still in Newfoundland a small residue of what I recently saw described as "the still a-cursing anti-confederates of St. John's." Unfortunately, some of these have a disproportionate influence on the government of the province. They would do anything to bring into disrepute the Government of Canada, and I feel that some of the invective we have heard emanating from some of the spokesmen in the province can be laid at their door.

While I have too high a regard for the Honourable Senator Lang to even consider that his motion was made with the intention of furthering this attitude, it certainly does nothing to help the situation. Accordingly, as far as his motion is concerned, it seems to me that it serves no useful purpose and only tends to aggravate this unfortunate situation. For those reasons, and those expressed by Senator Perrault, I must oppose it.

● (1620)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at any great length on the substance of the motion presented by Senator Lang. However, it would perhaps be useful to refresh our memories. The motion deplores the government's decision to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada a question that is currently before the Appeal Court of Newfoundland. This is the background for the motion's criticism of the government. It is a matter of procedure. I agree with Senator Lewis that under section 55 the federal government had the right to refer this question. The problem is a political one.

We must ask ourselves whether the government acted wisely in making this decision, considering the political and legal context of the reference made by the Government of Newfoundland to the Appeal Court of that province. The federal government, under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, has the right to refer any legal question to the Court.

Generally speaking, under their own legislation, when the provinces want a legal opinion—and making a reference is just that, it is not the same thing as appealing a judgment from one of the lower courts—they usually refer such questions to their own courts of appeal. In certain cases, provincial legislation does not provide for appeal to the Supreme Court. In many cases however, the relevant legislation has been amended recently. That was the case, for instance, in the province of Quebec when the provincial government made a reference on the constitutional proposal. At the time, the question was referred to the Quebec Court of Appeal. At the same time, the legislation was amended to allow for an appeal from the decision or opinion of the Court of Appeal of the province of Quebec to the Supreme Court of Canada.

As far as the motion is concerned, the government is being criticized for its strategy. Senator Perrault said that this has been going on for fourteen years. If it has, I do not see what difference it would make to wait one year longer to have a ruling by the Appeal Court of the province of Newfoundland. Another thing: the question referred by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada is only a small part of the question referred by the Government of Newfoundland to its Appeal Court. That is where the confusion starts. The federal government has asked the Supreme Court to define the respective jurisdictions of Newfoundland and Canada over the Hibernia territory, while the question referred by the Government of Newfoundland to its Court of Appeal includes the whole problem of seabed resources and ownership of the coastal areas down to the continental shelf, and may also concern the territorial rights of Newfoundland, its neighbouring provinces and St. Pierre and Miquelon.

The Newfoundland question is much broader in scope. I may point out that a Supreme Court decision on the Hibernia question alone would not necessarily settle the other problems contained in the reference to the Appeal Court of Newfoundland. That is where the problem lies. There is no doubt the federal government's decision was purely motivated by political strategy, and that is why it is being criticized, because it was done for political reasons, and although people say that Mr. Peckford was also politically motivated in making his reference to the Appeal Court of Newfoundland, the fact remains that since the federal government had refused to budge, it was understandable that he should take the action he did. He was not taking action against the federal government, but he was the first one to act. In the circumstances, the federal government is to be criticized for the retaliatory action it took subsequently.

I asked the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Government, who refused to give me an answer, what would happen if there were a contradiction between the two judgments. If the references were identical, I think the Newfoundland Appeal Court would prefer to wait and see, and no decision would be made. I shall presently give an example of an internal question similar to this situation, as a result of which the Quebec Court of Appeal decided not to hand down a judgment.

In the present circumstances, both references will remain before the respective courts. I cannot see the Newfoundland Appeal Court refraining from handing down a judgment because the Supreme Court is going to do so. They might prefer to wait before handing down a ruling on the remainder of the question. Assuming that that is what would happen, and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal hands down its judgment subsequently on the remainder of the reference and the judgment is not satisfactory to the federal government, it would then have to appeal to the Supreme Court on the remainder of the question on which the Newfoundland Court of Appeal has already made a judgment, but not the Supreme Court of Canada.

This would be absolute chaos. Once again, it is clear that the Minister of Justice's decision was simply a matter of political strategy and that is what is being criticized.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The same applies to Mr. Peckford's decision.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps, but he took the initiative, quite legitimately, and he did not act for the purpose of creating legal chaos. He was entitled to do what he did. Senator Perrault and others with him are complaining that this has been going on for fourteen years and it is time these differences were settled. But if exactly the same question were before both courts, the government could say that it was only trying to speed up the process. The way things are going now, however, they are only adding to the confusion by saying that they only wanted a decision on Hibernia and the rest will keep until later. So the rest of the question is going to remain in limbo during all this time. The federal government is perpetuating this debate and continuing the struggle between the two levels of government.

This is typical of the present government with its predilection for confrontation with the provinces, and, in fact, confrontation in all areas. Mr. Trudeau has decided that he is running the store, and no one else. Observers are agreed that for years it has been his policy to strengthen the central government at the expense of the rights of the provinces. I am sure the constitutional process was part of this trend. First, the government said it would find a way to force the issue, and then that it would be willing to negotiate the sharing of powers.

Senator Frith: Either we go along with what the provinces tell us or it is confrontation!

Senator Flynn: Yes, confrontation.

Senator Frith: We have to go along with whatever the provinces refer to the appeal courts or we get confrontation!

Senator Flynn: Certainly not. During the few months we were in power, we were able to resolve many problems without resorting to confrontation. But not Mr. Trudeau. Since he got back in power, things are just not happening fast enough for him. He knows he will not be running again, and he wants to do everything he set out to do and he is prepared to do so regardless.

Senator Frith: Everyone has a right to his own opinion.

Senator Flynn: Well, as far as the constitutional question is concerned—this is just a small example, Senator Frith—he really gave Quebec the runaround. He said Quebec had abandoned its veto right and all that. He went on regardless of Quebec's objections.

Now he says that if Quebec really wants its veto right, he might be able to do something. That is the kind of logic he indulges in. He was in such a rush to repatriate the Constitution with the Charter of Rights and an amending formula that he was prepared to ignore their objections, and he did.

Now that he has his Constitution, he says that he could perhaps try to get us back our veto right.

Well, this is unrealistic. He simply is in a hurry about everything and we can also see the results he gets: this political disaster of a government in all respects.

In any case, coming back to the discussion, there is one point on which I wanted to answer Senator Perrault; he stated that we knew not what we were talking about when we said that there was no precedent.

He quoted a long series of texts. I had all those cases examined in my law office and by the researchers of the Parliamentary Library. I am aware of all those references and there is only one which technically may be invoked in this debate. What we cannot accept is that the government has referred to the Supreme Court of Canada an issue which a provincial government already had referred to its provincial appeal court. There is the question: it was done concurrently and not subsequently. This is no private action launched by someone acting, for instance, in the public interest or even in his own interest, asking the Supreme Court to rule on it. We have an example of that in the orders in council concerning the internment of the Japanese. That issue was referred to the Supreme Court with a view to coming to a decision as soon as possible and sparing those who instituted the proceedings unnecessary expense.

There have been other similar cases. Senator Perrault mentioned Mr. Clark's opinion in two instances. The first goes back to October 19th, 1977, when Mr. Clark suggested that the Prime Minister could refer Bill 101 to the Supreme Court. Senator Perrault claims that as a precedent, which it is not at all. The Péquiste government would naturally not refer the matter to the courts: it had no interest in doing so. Separate proceedings had been launched, slowly progressing before a superior court, the Court of Appeal and so on, and Mr. Clark was wondering why the Supreme Court should not be asked to rule, in the very interest of the parties involved in those proceedings. So anyone trying to turn that statement into a precedent is really misleading the Senate and making a false representation.

The second reference as well had to do with a statement by Mr. Clark in the debate on the constitutional resolution. At that time, the Manitoba Court of Appeal had ruled that the resolution was legal, and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal had ruled that the resolution was illegal. We were faced with two contradictory decisions; still to come within 15 days was the ruling of the Quebec Court of Appeal where the issue was still under consideration.

It was obvious that with two decisions, two contradictory opinions, we could not stand pat. The case had to go before the Supreme Court. It was entirely normal to say: Appeal to the Supreme Court. But the request of Mr. Clark was not so much that the case be taken before the Supreme Court—it was obvious that it had to be done—the request was to suspend the debate in Parliament until a final decision had been made by the Supreme Court. So, once again Senator Perrault misinterpreted the opinion of Mr. Clark.

There were a lot of other decisions quoted by Senator Perrault and I could examine them one after another, but I do not want to delay the Senate needlessly. What I propose to do would be to have printed as an appendix to today's Hansard the critical analysis I obtained from Mr. Bruce Carson of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, if leave is granted, and I will only make a few comments on one case, the only case, in my opinion, which can be raised in support of the decision of the government. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: As this analysis shows, none of the rulings referred to by Senator Perrault constitutes a precedent for a referral by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada where a provincial government had a similar or a somewhat similar matter before a provincial appeal court. Once again, the only case is that of the Radio Act in 1932. The Province of Quebec had referred the matter to its appeal court, but no other province had done so. Of course, other provinces felt that broadcasting did not come under exclusive federal jurisdiction. Since there were very urgent problems to settle at the time, particularly treaties to be made with the United States concerning the sharing of the wavelengths and so on—the ruling of the Supreme Court is very interesting since it gives all the reasons invoked by the minister for making this reference. The matter was referred to the Supreme Court because, obviously, the ruling of the Quebec appeal court would not bind the other provinces. Another ruling of the Supreme Court was needed, whereas, in this case, Hibernia concerns only Newfoundland.

At the time, the Supreme Court—and this is rather interesting—found it unfortunate that the federal government had made this referral—the Supreme Court was not the highest court in the land then—while the Privy Council was considering the issue of the jurisdiction of the two levels of government in the field of aviation. In his notes, Mr. Justice Angliss, says, at the very outset of his preamble that Quebec had referred the matter to its appeal court, but had accepted, albeit reluctantly, that the Supreme Court would make a ruling in any case. This was not really a disagreement or a dispute between the two levels of government. That is why I suggest that while it might be technically a precedent, it is certainly not a good one. It is certainly not a precedent that justifies the attitude of confrontation and conflict typical of this government, which simply makes the relations between the two levels of government even more bitter.

If Senator Lewis supports the central government and Senator Doody supports Newfoundland, that is their own business. But the fact remains, in my opinion, that this move is wrong at this point because it worsens the climate. It exacerbates the problem existing between the two levels of government and is in line with the turn of events since the return to power of Mr. Trudeau in 1980.

In conclusion, I believe that the motion is well justified—I beg your pardon? Did Senator Lang say something?

Senator Lang: No, no.

Senator Flynn: I thought that he had expressed a view to which I should reply.

As I was saying, I suggest that the motion is in order and that from the political and practical point of view, we are right to support it. Again, from the strictly legal point of view, I would say that the federal government has every right to go ahead. Unfortunately, the ruling it is seeking from the Supreme Court will only complicate matters instead of settling an issue which the decision from the Newfoundland Court of Appeal might have settled; and I feel that if the federal government had shown some good will and had tried to obtain a settlement, it would have asked the Supreme Court the same question or a question as far reaching.

Senator Frith: The government tried to find a solution.

Senator Flynn: It should have asked the same question. Why not ask the same question?

Senator Frith: It was trying to settle this issue.

Senator Flynn: Why ask the same question twice? Because the Newfoundland Court of Appeal would have practically been in a position where it would have had to say: We will hand down no decision, for it would remain worthless as long as the Supreme Court had not handed down its own ruling. It would only confuse the issue.

Senator Frith: This is exactly the point which has to be decided.

Senator Flynn: You only made up your mind to seek a decision from the Supreme Court after the province of Newfoundland had sought a decision from its Court of Appeal.

Senator Asselin: Why is the federal government so anxious now to settle this issue, after dragging its feet for 14 years?

Senator Frith: We have tried to solve the problem.

Senator Asselin: You solve your political problems through references to the Supreme Court.

Senator Frith: For the reference.

Senator Flynn: You decided to settle the question after Newfoundland had its own case referred to the provincial appeal court.

Senator Frith: Before that.

Senator Flynn: I see—

Senator Frith: We want to settle the matter of the reference.

Senator Flynn: Why? Would you have accepted the same question which Newfoundland asked? It is broader in scope. It covered the whole problem.

Senator Frith: We tried to settle the question.

Senator Flynn: You tried to settle one single issue, Hibernia. This is where the fighting starts. You wanted to strike where it hurts. You wanted to strike them where their immediate interest was the greatest. You made that move to the Supreme Court in order to negotiate from a position of force. Once again, you wanted to entertain confusion. I suppose I must apologize for criticizing the government. It is easier to discuss with Senator Frith than with the Leader of the Government. Thank God, Senator Perrault is not here! He would be so shocked that I should dare think the government could be wrong. We will see whether by any chance the Senate could tell the government: This time, you are wrong, you men and women incapable of error; you, the infallible Trudeau!

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words in defence, really, of the courts of our land.

Senator Flynn: They are not being attacked.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am absolutely appalled at the statements about our courts made by Senator Lang in his speech last week. I was even more shocked that they should be made by a lawyer.

I shall confine my speech to quoting some of those statements and commenting upon them. The first I would like to refer to is his statement that:

The constitutional exercise, which we went through last year and this year... the court references that were invoked, and the imposition of a bill of rights upon our system, have dangerously politicized our judicial system.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Hear, hear!

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, the courts, particularly the Supreme Court of Canada, have been dealing with constitutional references and constitutional cases for over 100 years. Most of them used to go to the Privy Council, but since 1949 they have ultimately, of course, been decided by the Supreme Court of Canada. I suppose that, to a certain extent, any constitutional reference has some political implications, but there is nothing new in what happened last year as opposed to what has happened many times in the past.

Senator Donahoe: Not so! Not so!

Senator Godfrey: Senator Lang further stated:

Does this government now intend to go further, until we have confrontation between provincial courts and the federal courts?... Once we start to pit our federal and provincial courts against each other, we shall start to see the breakup of the judicial system we have known in Canada.

Senator Donahoe: Hear, hear!

Senator Godfrey: Senator Lang knows perfectly well that, every time an appeal is made from a provincial court of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada is, in effect, pitted against the appellate court. Nobody has ever suggested that there is anything wrong with that.

Senator Lang: Question! Question!

Senator Godfrey: Senator Lang goes on to state:

Suppose that the Supreme Court of Ontario adjudicates with one result and, without the matter being under appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the Supreme Court of Ontario, the Supreme Court of Canada adjudicates differently. We would have no rule of law any more; we would have legal chaos.

Surely, Senator Lang has been to law school and knows perfectly well that there have been many, many cases that stop at the court of appeal of a province, only to have the decided legal principle overruled, quite often years later, by the Supreme Court of Canada in a completely separate case. Nobody has ever suggested that this constitutes a threat of legal chaos. If the honourable senator does not remember such cases from his law school days, or his years of legal practice, I will be happy to remind him of a few.

Senator Lang also stated:

What is even worse is that it gives a public perception to the notion that our courts can be manipulated—provincial courts by provincial governments and federal courts by federal governments....

However, the fact that such a perception may be engendered by these proceedings can completely destroy the system.

As far as I am concerned, honourable senators, I do not think that the public has any such perception whatsoever. I think that our courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada, are held in the highest regard. I do not think it has ever occurred to anyone, other than Senator Lang, to suggest or think that the courts can be manipulated by any government.

Finally, he stated:

The process with which we are now faced when this motion to the Supreme Court of Canada returns next Friday, in my opinion, is an insult to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and a slur of contempt on the Supreme Court of Canada.

In my considered opinion it is Senator Lang, by the statements in his speech, who is insulting and bringing into contempt the courts of our land.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I have just a few brief comments to make. When I think about this debate—not the one in this chamber but the debate in the general sense—I have a feeling that it is beginning to resemble the prolonged wrangle we had over the Constitution. I do not think that that should have happened. Once again there is the frustration, which I know I feel and which I am sure is felt by the members of other legislative bodies, experienced when nobody seems to know the answer. On the one hand, we have lawyers stating that there are no precedents for the actions of the Government of Canada with regard to the visit of the Minister of Justice to Newfoundland a few days ago. On the other hand, we have equally esteemed, competent and recognized lawyers stating the exact opposite—that is, that there are precedents for such actions.

Senator Flynn: The facts speak for themselves.

Senator Rowe: We have all heard of the case that was referred to recently. I believe it was in 1932 when Prime Minister Bennett apparently did what the Government of Canada has done in respect of the Newfoundland Supreme Court. When the Leader of the Opposition referred to the dispute having gone on for 14 years, I was reminded of the fact that it was approximately 14 years ago when the Premier of Newfoundland, the then Attorney General of Newfoundland and I, while in Ottawa, went to pay a courtesy call, not a formal visit, on the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, whose office was in the East Block. I remember very vividly, for it was the first time I had ever been in the East Block.

• (1650)

After the preliminaries and the courtesies were done with, things got a little more serious, and, incidentally, I am not about to reveal the proceedings of a private meeting, or something that should remain a secret, because subsequently the views expressed by Mr. Pearson and Mr. Smallwood were made public by both gentlemen. The Prime Minister invited Premier Smallwood to bring up any matter that was on his mind. One matter that was very much on our minds at that time was the fact that, increasingly, the great oil companies of the world were coming to us in Newfoundland and saying, "We would like to get exploratory rights, or development rights, under the waters off Newfoundland and Labrador." We therefore put forward the claim that we owned those rights. That claim had not been recognized, up to that point, by the Government of Canada. Premier Smallwood said to the Prime Minister, "Newfoundland is still the poorest province of Canada, and at the rate we are going our relative position is not going to change." He then said, semi-jocularly, but at the same time semi-seriously, "How about Canada saying, 'Take those rights. We cede those rights to you?'" Mr. Smallwood then expatiated a little on the effects this would have on Newfoundland.

The Prime Minister listened carefully, and then gave his reply, which I am now obviously going to paraphrase, though some of the words will be the exact words Mr. Pearson used. He said, "Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to be able to do as you suggest; but I do not know whether the Government of Canada has the right to do that. I could take the necessary steps, and go through the motions, only to have, for example, Manitoba go to the Supreme Court of Canada and say, 'The Government of Canada has just given away something that belongs to the other nine provinces, and the Government of Canada has no right to do that.'" Mr. Pearson then said, with that wry grin on his face, "And I would look pretty silly at that point."

[Senator Rowe.]

Mr. Smallwood asked, "What do you suggest, Prime Minister?" Mr. Pearson replied, "Newfoundland could give up any claims it had. If you did that, then, of course, the rights would be vested in the Government of Canada. In that case, Canada would be very generous to Newfoundland, as long as I remain Prime Minister."

Mr. Smallwood said, "How do you define the word 'generous'?" The Prime Minister replied, "Well, let us say—and I am just thinking out loud now—75 per cent for you and 25 per cent for Canada."

Mr. Smallwood replied, "That would be very good, but I am not sure that it would be acceptable to the people of Newfoundland." Mr. Pearson then said, "Well, the other suggestion I would make is that we take a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. If the Supreme Court of Canada should decide that the rights belong to Newfoundland, nothing would please me more. If, on the other hand, the Supreme Court decides that the rights belong to Canada, then we will still be generous."

The Prime Minister said, finally, "I suggest that, in view of the fact that a political settlement seems unlikely at this time, we do take a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada."

And that is where the matter was left.

All of that happened about 14 years ago. People have often wondered why it was not submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada at that time, and personally I do not know all the reasons, though I suspect what some of them were. For one thing, I am sure that some of our legal advisers at the time felt that Newfoundland might lose the case, and that to participate in such a reference would do us no good. There may have been other reasons as well. I do know that the matter was under constant study by the Government of Newfoundland right up to 1971. Then, of course, in 1971 there was a change of government; the Smallwood administration was defeated, and a new administration took over.

My feeling, as I sat in the Prime Minister's office over in the East Block, at the time I referred to and throughout the 14 years since, was, and, indeed, today, is that we should have referred it to the Supreme Court of Canada. If not 12 or 13 years ago, it should have been referred at least three or four years ago, as the various problems emerged.

Though this was never done, I do not castigate anybody. I do not want to make any attack on the Premier of Newfoundland for the stand he has taken; indeed, I sympathize with his feelings with regard to some of these matters. He has inherited the problem that we had, and which has been a perennial one in Newfoundland for 400 years. There have been only three occasions in the entire history of the province—and if I have said this before, please forgive me—when there has been relatively full-scale employment, comparable to, say, what is the norm in Ontario. These three occasions were: the war of 1812-14 between Britain and the United States; the first world war; and the second world war. For the rest of the time there has been wholesale unemployment. Now, once more, Newfoundland, as Senator Doody so eloquently stated last night, is faced with the recurrent curse of unemployment, and I appreciate, to some degree, why Mr. Peckford and his supporters have taken the stand they have.

I must say, however, that I deplore any attempt to make the situation look as if it is a case of the good guys against the bad guys, or of cops and robbers, or the white man versus the Indians. That, I fear, is an attitude that has developed over the last year or two, and I think we should do away with it. I am filled with regret when I hear references, as happened in one instance, to those who have taken a certain stand as being courageous. The implication there is obvious, and we do not need it. I do not believe that those Newfoundland members of the Senate or of the House of Commons who may oppose this resolution, should be accused, directly or indirectly, of lacking courage. I do not think that does any good. This is not the time, I suggest to you, for castigation, and it is certainly not the time to try to pit one of our supreme courts against another.

There is a feeling abroad, it seems to me—and this, too, is something I regret, though I am not suggesting that it has been said by the proponents of this resolution—that if this case went only to the Newfoundland Supreme Court, Newfoundland might get more sympathetic treatment than it would get from the Supreme Court of Canada. No one has come out and said that directly, but this is the idea that seems to be floating around. Surely, that is a denigration of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, made up, as it is, of men who are, in my view, some of Canada's most distinguished lawyers, men of great experience, men who are products of the great law schools of Canada and, indeed, of the world. I do not think anybody has the right to make such a suggestion. The fact is that this matter, sooner or later, had inevitably to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. I repeat that I believe it should have gone there three years ago, and the quicker we can get it settled the better it will be, not only for Newfoundland but also for Canada. I regret, in one sense, that I cannot support this motion, but I do not believe it is justified at this time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will recall that under our rules Senator Lang has the right to reply on a substantive motion, and in so doing his speech will close the debate.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, in rising in reply, I am really rising on a question of privilege. I have been in this chamber for at least 18 years, and I have never before had the distinction of being referred to as a malicious liar. That is really quite an achievement. If honourable senators refer to last Thursday's Hansard, they will find that in the English translation I am reported as having stated something that is a malicious untruth—

An Hon. Senator: That's all right.

Senator Lang: That is a pretty moderate statement. But in the French version it says "un mensonge malicieux." In other words, I have been accused by the Leader of the Government in the Senate of maliciously lying.

Senator Frith: No, no—by the translator.

Senator Lang: I do not know who doctors the blues, but I could not be more complimented when I realize the source from which those remarks arise.

Honourable senators, I hope that the degeneration of the Senate, which is exemplified in Senator Perrault's remarks of last Thursday, will not continue. Let me give honourable senators an example, let me excerpt his words. In his speech he used the following terms: "I think it is a despicable charge"; "This is a malicious untruth"; "this shabby kind of motion"; "help to give the lie". Well, honourable senators, perhaps I have been here too long—

Senator Flynn: That is typical of him.

Senator Lang: Something has happened in this chamber when we hear such remarks, when I was speaking to a narrow and relatively esoteric question.

In the course of Senator Perrault's remarks he said that I had not done any research, but he had done a whole lot, or his staff had done it. Unfortunately, being an ordinary senator, I do not have a large staff.

Senator Flynn: He should have checked his own research.

Senator Lang: At page 4212 of Hansard Senator Perrault refers to all the precedents for the government's action. Honourable senators, I can tell you right now that those precedents are invalid. They have nothing to do with the issue. I believe he mentioned 12 precedents, but the only one that has any relevance whatsoever might be the Radio Act case in 1932, and even there the Quebec and federal governments had agreed to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. Who is making malicious lies? Is it me, or is it someone who sits on the other side? I am not insensitive to personal insults, but during the past week I have had something directed at me which transcends all my experiences since induction into the Senate.

In concluding, may I attempt to narrow the motion that I raised? My motion has nothing to do with who owns the offshore rights in Hibernia. I could not care less.

An Hon. Senator: You should.

Senator Lang: My motion has nothing to do with the legality of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada or to a provincial court. My motion has to do with the propriety of a government's making a reference under these circumstances. That is all I am talking about, and that is all this motion is about—the propriety of the government's action.

Honourable senators, please remember that our judicial system is one court—provincial or federal, it is all one court. That is what we are talking about. Any government that tries, or anyone else who tries to circumvent the one-court system by jumping the appellate structure is a menace to our judiciary. That is all that my motion is about.

I come from Ontario. It is really academic to me who owns the offshore resources. I am talking about our system of government, about our judicial system. I hope honourable senators will accept my motion in that vein.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.:

That the Senate deplores the decision of the Government of Canada to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question of jurisdiction over the seabed resources off Newfoundland, called Hibernia, while at the same time the Appeal Court of Newfoundland is seized with the matter that includes this very question.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the senators.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am wondering whether the meeting of the Rules Committee is going to take place despite the lateness of the hour.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I think it would be worthwhile meeting even though we only have three-quarters of an hour. I believe to hold a meeting would still be helpful. So, I suggest that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders meet when the Senate rises.

A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF REFERENCE CASE PRECEDENTS

(PREPARED BY RESEARCH BRANCH, LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT)

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this paper is to review and critically analyse the applicability of the cases referred to by the federal government to justify the reference by the central government of the Newfoundland offshore minerals question to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The text of the referral of the Newfoundland offshore question reveals that there is a reference pending before the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland under Order-in-Council no. 135-1982 approved on February 12, 1982.⁽¹⁾ The issue which has to be addressed in the cases which are discussed below is whether a question has been referred by the central government to the Supreme Court of Canada for adjudication while the same question or a similar question is pending on a reference before a provincial court of appeal. In addition, it is appropriate to examine the attitude of the provincial government as to whether it supported the reference by the central government, or whether it opposed it and decided to continue with its own reference before its own Court of Appeal.

CASES REFERRED TO BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

1. 1976: The Anti-Inflation Act⁽²⁾

In relation to this case there is no indication that a reference case had commenced in a provincial Court of Appeal. The Province of Ontario may have been considering such a reference because its method of implementation of the Act was being questioned. However, the order-in-council authorizing the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada does not reveal any pending litigation.

2. 1970: The Breathalyzer Act⁽³⁾

The central issue in this case was whether s. 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act which dealt with the requirements for taking samples of breath for analysis was validly brought into force on December 1, 1969. The reference to the Supreme Court of Canada was by Order-in-Council 1970-643 dated April 14, 1970, and it reveals that in the case of The Queen v. Story⁽⁴⁾, Mr. Justice Munroe of the Supreme Court of British Columbia dismissed a charge of driving while impaired, on the grounds that s. 16 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act was not validly proclaimed, and was not and has never been in force.

In order to determine the legality of the proclamation of s. 16, the matter was referred by the central government to the Supreme Court of Canada and the reference was supported by the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. No provinces appeared in opposition.

3. 1975: Eastern Stevedoring⁽⁵⁾

The issue in this case was whether the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which deals with labour relations and provides for collective bargaining, certification and revocation thereof, applied to the Eastern Canada Stevedoring Company Limited. The dispute arose because the United Mineworkers of America applied to the Ontario Labour Relations Board for certification as the bargaining agent of the same employees of the stevedoring company that the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks and Employees had received certification for through the Minister of Labour for Canada. The Brotherhood applied to the Supreme Court of Ontario for an order quashing the decision of the Ontario Labour Relations Board. The Attorney General of Ontario intervened and notified the Attorney General for Canada that in those proceedings, the constitutional validity of the federal act would be brought into question. The reference was therefore made in order to settle the dispute and obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada as to the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament to enact the statute.

4. 1948: Saskatchewan Minimum Wage Act⁽⁶⁾

In this case, the post mistress of the post office at Maple Creek, Saskatchewan was paying a person working in the federal post office less than the Saskatchewan minimum wage. She was convicted as being in violation of the Saskatchewan statute by a police magistrate and the conviction was upheld by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal by way of stated case. An appeal did not lie to the Supreme Court of Canada from the decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal and as the Minister of Justice was informed by the Post Master General that if the laws of the various provinces relating to hours of employment and minimum wages were applicable to persons employed in the post offices, then the cost of operation of the postal service in certain provinces would be increased. For that reason, the question was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether "the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal was right in holding in its decision in Williams v. Graham that the Minimum Wage Act was applicable to the post office at Maple Creek, Saskatchewan."⁽⁷⁾

5. 1946: Japanese Deportation Orders⁽⁸⁾

The reference in this case concerned the legality of certain orders-in-council made pursuant to the War Measures Act⁽⁹⁾ dealing with Japanese residents in Canada. Prior to the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, an action had been commenced against the Attorney General of Canada by the Cooperative Committee on Japanese-Canadians for a declaration that these orders-in-council were ultra vires, illegal and void.

"It was, therefore, felt that, in the circumstances, in the public interest, the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada should be obtained upon a question of the validity of the aforesaid orders-in-council, because in the opinion of the Acting Minister of Justice, they raised an important question of law touching the interpretation of dominion legislation."⁽¹⁰⁾

There is no indication in the reported case as to what became of the private litigation, but on the reference case, only the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan were represented and they supported the position of the Attorney General for Canada. The Cooperative Committee on Japanese-Canadians attended and argued against the validity of the orders-in-council.

6. 1943: Chemicals⁽¹¹⁾

This reference concerned orders-in-council passed regulating the use of chemicals under the War Measures Act. The order-in-council authorizing the reference⁽¹²⁾ stated that a charge of an offence based on an order made by a controller appointed to supervise the operation of these orders-in-council was dismissed by a county court judge in the County of York in the Province of Ontario on the ground that the order of the Governor General in Council conferring power on the controller was invalid inasmuch as it constituted a delegation of authority of the Governor General in Council under the War Measures Act. Other magistrates hearing similar complaints, as a result of this decision, either dismissed the complaints or withheld their decisions. Therefore, in view of the fact that the authority of the central government in relation to these orders-in-council had been questioned in a lower court, a reference was made to the Supreme Court of Canada.

7. 1943: United States Forces⁽¹³⁾

The order-in-council referring the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada states:

That a question has arisen as to the relationship of the authorities and courts of Canada to the aforesaid forces (United States Forces) and more particularly as to whether criminal proceedings may be prosecuted in Canada before any Canadian court against a member of the military or naval forces of the United States of America.

That cases have already occurred in which members of the military forces of the United States of America present in Canada have been charged with having committed criminal offences in Canada and questions have arisen as to whether such members are subject to be prosecuted in the criminal courts of Canada or whether service courts established for the purpose by the United States military authorities have exclusive jurisdiction in that behalf.⁽¹⁴⁾

The order-in-council does not reveal whether any of these cases had been disposed of or whether they were stayed pending the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the reference. However, this is certainly not the situation of a reference of the matter which was pending as a reference case before provincial courts.

8. 1938: The Adoption Act⁽¹⁵⁾

Prior to this reference, a decision of the Court of Appeal of Alberta⁽¹⁶⁾ and a decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario⁽¹⁷⁾, held that only persons appointed by the Governor General were capable of exercising the powers conferred by the statutes in question and the Chief Justice of Ontario described the question of jurisdiction as being of great public interest and importance and stated that it was desirable that it should be settled by the Supreme Court of Canada.⁽¹⁸⁾ Therefore on the request of the Attorney General of Ontario, a reference was made by the Attorney General of Canada to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine the validity of provisions relating to the exercise of judicial powers in relation to the statutes in question.

9. 1935: The Temperance Act⁽¹⁹⁾

As pointed out in the order-in-council requesting the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, the main reason for the request was the fact that the Court of Appeal of the province of New Brunswick, in the case of Sheehan v. Shaw⁽²⁰⁾ had held that certain parts of the Canada Temperance Act were inoperative. As no appeal had been taken from this case to the Supreme Court of Canada, it was thought appropriate that the matter be finally determined by way of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.⁽²¹⁾

10. 1934: The Tariff Board⁽²²⁾

The question as to the authority of the Tariff Board to decide questions of law was appealed to the Governor in Council by a Canadian manufacturer. It was his contention that the Tariff Board had exceeded its jurisdiction in making an order affecting certain goods. Therefore the question as to the authority of the Tariff Board to decide questions of law was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. No provinces were represented but counsel for the Attorney General of Canada appeared as well as counsel for four Canadian manufacturers. There was no litigation pending at the time of this case in any provincial court of appeal questioning the jurisdiction of the Tariff Board.

11. 1934: Section 110 of the Dominion Companies Act⁽²³⁾

The Ontario Court of Appeal in the case of Meyer Malt and Grain Co. v. Coombs⁽²⁴⁾ had declared that this section of the Dominion Companies Act was ultra vires the jurisdiction of the central government. When the validity of the statute had been attacked in the Ontario Court of Appeal, the Attorney General of Canada had been notified and he had intervened. An appeal from the Ontario Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada had entered but as the action was settled, the appeal was discontinued. As a result of these circumstances it was determined that the best way to arrive at an answer as to the constitutional validity of this section was on a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.⁽²⁵⁾

12. 1932: Radio Broadcasting Act⁽²⁶⁾

The order-in-council referring this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada reveals that prior to the reference taking place, the jurisdiction of Parliament to exercise legislative authority in this area had been questioned.⁽²⁷⁾ Prior to the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, the province of Quebec had referred a similar question to its Court of Appeal for an opinion on the constitutionality of the authority of the central government in this area. Upon the institution of this reference by the central government, the province of Quebec appeared in the Supreme Court of Canada reference and suspended proceedings in the provincial court of appeal.⁽²⁸⁾ In fact, on March 3, 1931, the Quebec reference came up for hearing in the Quebec Court of Appeal and was adjourned until May pending the outcome of the central government's reference. Only the government of Quebec appeared on the adjournment, the government of Canada was not represented. The Supreme Court of Canada heard the federal reference commencing a three-day hearing on May 3, 1931, and rendered judgment on June 30, 1931. Both the governments of Quebec and Ontario appeared in opposition to the federal claim of jurisdiction in radio communication.

A review of the Montreal Star during this period indicates no displeasure at the fact that the central government had referred the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. There was also no indication of any opposition to the procedure of the federal government in the articles published in legal journals concerning this case. We have been unable to determine as of this date what became of the reference to the Quebec Court of Appeal. It is obvious that it was never proceeded with but we have been unable to ascertain as to whether a consent to dismissal has been filed.

1928: Fish Canneries⁽²⁹⁾

In the case of The King v. The Somerville Cannery Company, Limited, the Supreme Court of British Columbia upheld a decision of a British Columbia magistrate wherein the defendant was acquitted on a charge of unlawfully operating a fish cannery without a federal licence. The judgment proceeded on the ground that the requirement for an annual licence from the federal government to operate a fish cannery for commercial purposes was ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada. There was no provision for an appeal from that decision and therefore the central government referred the question as to the ultimate jurisdiction in the matter of fisheries to the Supreme Court of Canada.⁽³⁰⁾

CONCLUSION

In order to maintain consistency in dealing with the background of the cases noted above, we have referred specifically to the facts as set out in the orders-in-council referring the questions in issue to the Supreme Court of Canada. A comparison of the situation in the cases referred to, and the Newfoundland offshore question reveals that the only similar fact situation is in the 1932 Radio Broadcasting Act reference. However, there was no apparent opposition on the part of Quebec to the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada by the central government and the reference to the Quebec Court of Appeal did not proceed.

All the other cases seem to involve the central government in referring matters for clarification in relation to law suits which cannot be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, or will not be appealed to the Supreme Court. None of the other cases involve the central government referring a matter to the Supreme Court of Canada while it is the subject of a reference which is continuing in a provincial court of appeal.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-102, to amend the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act.

Bill read the first time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, June 8, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 4283.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 8, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to Question Period and apropos the subject of sittings, I would draw your attention to the fact that June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day, falls on a Thursday. Traditionally, the House of Commons and the Senate do not sit on St. Jean Baptiste Day. In the following week there is another holiday, July 1, which also falls on a Thursday.

● (1410)

Because we have, and will continue to have, a substantial amount of business before us this month I have discussed with the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the Senate the possibility of our sitting on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of those two weeks so that the number of sittings will not be lessened.

Therefore, I give you informal notice, honourable senators, that, unless something unexpected comes about necessitating a further change, the adjournment motion that I normally move will, for those two weeks, be for Monday evening at 8 o'clock, rather than Tuesday evening.

To reiterate, so that it is perfectly clear, we will sit on Monday, evening, June 21, at 8 o'clock, Tuesday, June 22, at 2 p.m., and Wednesday, June 23, at 2 p.m., after which we will adjourn until the following Monday evening, June 28, at 8 o'clock, and will sit the same hours on the same days during that week.

Honourable senators, I am informing you of this schedule for your own plans, of course, but also to warn committees of the changes in the scheduling. No doubt they will want to schedule or reschedule some hearings on the basis of those different sitting times.

Honourable senators, I am sorry to say that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will not be here today, but I expect he will be back with us next week. I should say, too, that honourable senators may have noticed that he was referred to rather frequently during the debate that was held over the past three days. I will ensure that the comments concerning him will be drawn to his attention.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Which ones are you referring to—those we can make now or those that have been made before?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Was the deputy leader's last statement a threat or reward?

Hon. David Walker: Or a promise?

Senator Frith: A promise. Thank you, Senator Walker.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Recently published Dun & Bradstreet figures indicate, first, that the bankruptcy rate in Canada has approached the 1932 threshold, and, secondly, that, adjusted for population, it is two-and-a-half times the rate of bankruptcies occurring in the United States. Would the Minister of State for Economic Development offer the government's explanation as to why the Canadian bankruptcy rate should be two-and-a-half times that of the United States?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, without accepting the accuracy of the premise, because obviously it is an opinion—

Senator Balfour: It is a statistical fact.

Senator Olson: No, it is not a fact. What appear in the newspapers are not necessarily facts; sometimes they are opinions. I have learned that "opinion" and "fact," especially coming from the opposition, are not necessarily synonymous. Therefore, without accepting that as factual, I will try to get a response to the question, which I think requested some kind of explanation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I know that we very seldom get opinions from the government; we get statements, and they are usually false.

Senator Olson: That is not correct, honourable senators. My honourable friend has to accept what I suppose is a fact. When he asks for opinions and does not necessarily agree with the opinions expressed in response to such requests, that does not necessarily make those opinions untrue.

Senator Flynn: The minister always says that he is not there to give an opinion; that he is only there to talk about facts. That is where he is very seldom right.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have read Beauchesne rather carefully.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Flynn: When did you do that?

• (1415)

Senator Olson: If my honourable friend had read and studied citation 357 very carefully—which I assume the Leader of the Opposition has done, since he has been in this place long enough—and had applied his wisdom to an interpretation of what is contained therein, he would see that it indicates he is not supposed to ask for an opinion; he is supposed to ask for information.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RELOCATION OF OFFICE IN LONDON, ENGLAND

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government, which he will probably have to take as notice. It has to do with a representation I have received from the Veterans Affairs officer in London, England, who expresses deep concern about the relocation of the Veterans Affairs office to Macdonald House.

For years that office has been shunted around, and each move results in less office space being allocated. This causes great concern to Canadian veterans in England. It also causes great concern to Mr. Percy Towgood, one of the most dedicated Veterans Affairs officers in the department.

Would the Deputy Leader of the Government find out from the Department of Veterans Affairs if it has made representations to the Department of External Affairs that this move should not be made? The move is supposed to have been made on June 1, so time is of the essence. Would the deputy leader attempt to get that information as quickly as possible?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not familiar with the information that is the basis of Senator Marshall's question. If he has any further information, he could perhaps pass it to me, and I shall try to have an answer next week.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, yesterday the question of delayed answers was discussed, and it looked as though Senator Olson was a culprit in terms of coming forward with delayed answers.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is an opinion.

Senator Nurgitz: I welcome the opportunity to raise with the Deputy Leader of the Government a question that he undertook to answer as far back as December 16 of last year. The question related to companies carrying on the business of selling what amounts to arms to some smaller countries.

With the current problems in the South Atlantic and the instability in other parts of the world, I think this is a rather important question and one which ought not to go unanswered any longer.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I welcome the chance to take some of the criticism that I provoked yesterday by, I think, an injudicious comment I made at the end of Question Period on the subject of delayed answers.

I will definitely put a tracer on the substance of the question raised by Senator Nurgitz. I do remember its being asked, and I am sorry that I have not either answered it or reported why I have not answered it before now.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, will the Minister of State for Economic Development state whether the weekly bank rate was raised today, and, if so, by what amount?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I received a telephone call informing me that the rate, as at 2 o'clock today, moved to 15.87 per cent—that is, up forty-four one-hundredths of one per cent.

Senator Murray: Is the minister in a position to advise the Senate of the factors that were involved in that increase today?

Senator Olson: I expect it is in response to some movement in interest rates in the United States. I would not like to give a full explanation of that because I have done it in this place so many times, and I assume my friend will remember the actual explanations I have given.

Obviously, given the number of functions they perform, the banks have to take this into account. It is their judgment that bears on what the appropriate rate should be for this week in order to satisfactorily perform their functions.

Senator Murray: In the judgment of the government, will this be sufficient to prevent a decline in the value of the Canadian dollar to below 80 cents U.S. again, or may we expect further depletion of the reserves?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, you would also have to make predictions as to supply and demand and the offerings and bids for Canadian dollars in the market. That has a very direct relationship to the fluctuation that has taken place, which I described a few days ago. That term becomes more and more valid, because, as my honourable friends opposite were trying to say two or three days ago, the fluctuation, according to that definition, was only down. If they want to look at the last few hours, they will see that it has come up again.

● (1420)

Senator Murray: I do not want to enter into a debate with the minister, but, honourable senators, the minister should not try to mislead the Senate with that kind of nonsense. The trend is down, down, down, and the only way that it has been arrested is by an unprecedented use of foreign exchange reserves, and, now, a $US750 million rescue operation being mounted by the government.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is an expression of opinion. The rules say that a senator putting a question in Question Period is supposed to seek, not to give, information. That is clear. My honourable friend, instead of asking a question, gives information, but, worse than that, the information that he gives is, of course, absolutely untrue. He says the trend is down, down, down; whereas in the last day it has gone up. He also says that it was an unprecedented intervention by the Bank of Canada. That statement is not true either.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The size of the intervention is, however.

Senator Olson: It is sizeable, but not unprecedented.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have the answer to a question asked on May 19 by the Honourable Senator Smith, as to whether there is any precedent since Confederation wherein the federal government, after a matter had been referred to a supreme court of a province but before the judgment of that court had been rendered, referred the same matter, or a similar matter, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The reply is fairly lengthy, and I would ask that it go into the record as having been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In the Reference as to the Jurisdiction of Parliament to Regulate and Control Radio Communication, [1931] S.C.R. 541 the federal government made a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada after the question of Parliament's jurisdiction had been submitted by the Quebec government to the Court of King's Bench (in appeal) of the Province.

There have also been several cases where a Supreme Court Reference has been taken while the issue is before provincial superior courts. The most recent examples are:

1976 Reference re: Anti-Inflation Act, where proceedings were underway pursuant to the Ontario Judicial Review Procedure Act

1970 Reference re: Breathalyzer which involved proceedings in the British Columbia Supreme Court, a decision of Munroe J. that Breathalyzer sections of Criminal Code were not validly in force. A reference was taken to quickly resolve the matter.

1955 Reference: Eastern Canada Stevedoring Company. Here was an application to quash an Ontario Labour Relations Board decision, questioning the validity of the federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The matter was referred to the Supreme Court just four days before the date set for hearing before the Ontario court.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question asked on April 27 by Senator Charbonneau relating to Canadian oil imports from Mexico, and I would ask that it also go into the record as having been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will recall that the winter of 1979 was an unsettling time for those involved in energy planning. It was the time of the Iranian revolution and oil exports from that country virtually had ceased. You may also recall the incident of a multinational oil company (EXXON) diverting Venezuelan crude destined for eastern Canada, to another offshore market that was heavily reliant on Iranian exports. These circumstances led then energy minister Alastair Gillespie to start negotiations with Mexico for crude oil, negotiations which culminated in the Energy Cooperation Agreement. This was an important agreement for Canadians in that eastern Canada has a new, secure oil supplier on the same continent and one which, moreover, is not a member of OPEC.

In August 1980, an agreement was signed between Petro-Canada and Petroleos Mexicanos (Pemex) for the purchase of 50,000 barrels per day of Mexican crude for a minimum of 10 years. Pricing and the crude quality mix of volumes are reviewed on a quarterly basis.

THE ECONOMY

IMPERIAL OIL—EXPLORATION CUTBACK—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised by Senator Balfour on May 13 relating to the Beaufort Sea exploration program. I would also like this included in today's proceedings as though it had been read, since it too is fairly lengthy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Beaufort Sea exploration program announced by the Government of Canada and Esso Resources Canada Ltd. on May 10, 1982, involves six exploration agreements having terms of five years each, and over that period the program is estimated to cost $600 million. By involving Canadian companies in the exploration agreements, the Canadian ownership rate is expected to increase to an average of 50 per cent, exclusive of the Crown's right to a share of 25 per cent as provided for in the Canada Oil and Gas Act, thereby qualifying the project for a production licence.

Incentive payments to individual companies under terms of the Petroleum Incentives Program will not be known until eligibility of their expenditures is determined in terms of the program's specifications. If all expenditures are eligible, and if the sharing of expenditures proceeds as now planned, incentive payments could aggregate in the order of $400 million for the Beaufort exploration program.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE REQUESTED FOR SMALL- AND MEDIUM-SIZE BUSINESSES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Asselin on April 28 relating to federal assistance for Quebec's small- and medium-size businesses. Again, I request that this reply be taken as read and printed in the Debates of the Senate for this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On March 1, as honourable senators will recall, the Minister of Energy, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of State for Small Businesses met in Quebec City with that province's Ministers of Economic Development and of Industry and Commerce.

The federal government's response at that meeting was that several programs and a wide array of measures were already available to small- and medium-size businesses. As a matter of fact, the Canadian government, during the past year, has provided loan guarantees, under the Small Business Loans Act, to more than 5,000 small businesses in Quebec. If we consider the past five years, 29,000 small businesses in Quebec have received direct assistance through federal programs.

Also of help is the small business bond, which is a tax measure tailored specifically to assist businesses cope with high interest rates, and is particularly well suited for the current adverse economic climate. Other federal assistance programs include those for enterprise development, export markets development and for productivity improvement in the defense industries, which are programs administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; grants allowed under Department of Regional Economic Expansion programs; and assistance by the Federal Business Development Bank. That is not an exhaustive list of federal programs of assistance, of which there are more than four hundred.

During March and April, officials of the two levels of government have met to discuss what additional help the federal government might make available. A major effort is being made to build additional flexibility into federal programs and it is expected that a public announcement on the subject could be made in the near future.

THE ECONOMY

IMPERIAL OIL—EXPLORATION CUTBACK—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised on May 13 by Senator Balfour relating to the Imperial Oil budget reduction. This reply is three pages in length, and I would ask that it be included in Debates of the Senate as having been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

As honourable senators will recall, reports have been carried in the press on a budget reduction of $2.4 billion over the period of 1982-86 by Imperial Oil Limited from the previously planned level of $7.4 billion. While this has been described as an exploration budget, it is actually the company's exploration and capital budget. Major reductions in planned spending reflect the moth-balling of the Cold Lake project and withdrawal from the Petalta styrene project (jointly with Nova).

The following extracts from a May 12 address by W. J. Young, Senior Vice-President of Imperial, are representative of the company's plan, and indicate a positive and optimistic approach to oil and gas resource development.

We moved quickly and decisively. In a nutshell, since the middle of last year we have trimmed our exploration and capital spending plans for the period 1982-86 by roughly one-third—from $7.4 billion to a current figure of $5 billion. In the process we have subjected every prospective new project to the most searching scrutiny, not only in the light of Imperial's reduced investment capabilities but also in terms of each project's ability to generate early profit and to contribute to long-term strategy. Cold Lake, which has gone into cold storage for at least three years, and our participation in the Petalta styrene/benzene project were, unfortunately, among the casualties.

This year our planned capital expenditures will be about the same as they were for 1981: in the region of a billion dollars.

While on the subject of heavy oil I should mention that, while our full-scale Cold Lake project has been deferred, production from our pilot-plant program there was increased last year to a not-inconsiderable 14,000 barrels a day. Production from these pilot plants is currently running at a very low level because of the depressed demand for heavy crude but we expect it to pick up later in the year.

In exploration generally, we plan to participate wherever possible with Canadian-owned companies, not only to qualify for maximum grants under the NEP's Canadian-ownership rules but also to spread the risks and costs.

We remain bullish about the Beaufort and will continue to be very active there. Last year's test results from our Issungnak well were very encouraging and, as you may remember, followed an earlier successful well drilled from this site in 1980. We regard the Beaufort as having high potential for large-scale oil production. The same can be said for the Atlantic offshore, where we expect to resume drilling in the near future after conducting extensive seismic work over the last three years.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised by Senator Manning on May 13 under the same heading relating to exploration and development transfers. Since this reply is also fairly lengthy, I would request that it be taken as read and included in the proceedings for today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

As early as 1976, the federal government, in An Energy Strategy for Canada, announced its desire to accelerate exploration in northern Canada. Recognizing the costly, high-risk nature of exploration in this area, the federal government has over time put into place various incentives to encourage northern exploration. For example, under the NEP's Petroleum Incentive Program, expenditures incurred exploring for oil and gas in the north and offshore will be entitled to an incentive equal to 25 per cent of eligible exploration expenses. All other PIP incentives will depend upon the Canadian ownership and degree of Canadian control of the applicant, the location of the expenditure (i.e. exploration, development of eligible assets). The size of these variable incentives will range from 10 per cent to 55 per cent of eligible expenditures. The maximum incentive for a Canadian company exploring in the Canada Lands will, therefore, amount to 80 per cent of eligible expenditures.

To quote from the National Energy Program:

It remains necessary to provide a strong incentive for northern exploration... Canada may not need its resources in the north for domestic markets until the 1990's, but there may be merit in using Arctic oil in Canada, should viable deposits be found, to relieve the pressure on Alberta's reserves. In the case of natural gas, the need for Arctic gas in Canadian markets may not arise for many years. Yet we should press ahead with exploration, so that Canadians will know that a secure source of oil and gas is available as our "safety net" for the future.

The government is pleased to see that private industry is taking advantage of incentives that have been provided.

The federal government does not anticipate any major downturn in activity in western Canada's petroleum sector because a few companies have taken the initiative to diversify their activities and move some of their operations into the Beaufort Sea.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE MILITIA—RUMOURED REDUCTION IN BUDGET—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, on May 18 I asked a question of the Leader of the Government with respect to a concern expressed to the Minister of National Defence by the Commanding Officer of the Regimental Council of Brockville Rifles concerning militia pay. I have still not received an answer.

However, on May 19 the minister made a statement to the Committee on National Defence, in which he answered that very question.

If at this late date, June 3, I have still not had an answer, and yet the answer is well known and has been publicized, surely there must be something wrong with the administration. Why should such a delay have occurred, when all the department needed to do was read the minister's note in order to answer my question on May 20?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it would certainly have been much more desirable had the people in the department realized that the material they were preparing for the committee hearing should have been forwarded to the senator. It looks like a case of the left hand not knowing, when it should have, what the right hand was doing. Certainly, the information should have been available to all parties at the same time. I will try to find out why that was not the case.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-114, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 2).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
K1A 0A1
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 3, 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 3rd day of June, 1982, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,

PRIVATE BILL

E.G. KLEIN LIMITED—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Third reading of the Bill S-26, intituled: "An Act to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act".
(Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I advised the committee as well as Senator Frith that I only had a few comments to make on third reading of this bill. I also informed Senator Frith that I was waiting for the transcript of the committee's proceedings. Unfortunately, I have not received the proceedings since they have not yet been printed. After making some enquiries this morning, I managed to obtain what appears to be an unrevised draft. To avoid making any mistakes, with your leave I shall wait until I receive the official proceedings, possibly early next week, since third reading cannot be postponed indefinitely. At that time I shall add the comments I wish to make to the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I feel this is entirely satisfactory, especially considering the fact that Senator Leblanc, who sponsored the bill, will not be here until next week.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-THIRD MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 27, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Hicks calling the attention of the Senate to the twenty-third meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Key Largo, Florida, from 4th to 8th March, 1982, and to the report of such meeting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe I can undertake that my observations on the meeting of Canadian and United States parliamentarians, recently held in Florida, will maintain that spirit of calm reason which seems to prevail in the chamber this afternoon. I can promise no excitement of any kind. After all, we had an excellent presentation on the whole matter the other day by our senatorial "chairman of the board," Senator Hicks, and there is little that can be added to the official report he gave to the house in detail and, I believe, with judgment.

This afternoon I wish to offer a few reflections which are entirely personal and probably reflect my standing as a novice in these matters of international affairs, because, in a sense, it is a cautionary tale. I very much enjoyed going to that meeting because it gave me an opportunity to reflect on the fact that life is a learning experience, and, in meeting with American parliamentarians, it sharpens one's appreciation of the problems of government in this country and of our relations with our most important neighbour.

The Americans, of course, are such a friendly lot. They are cordial. They are frank. They have an engaging way of presenting their self-interest in matters that concern our two nations, and if one has an opportunity to get beneath the surface of things one will find that there is the capacity to understand the other person's point of view. That is something for which I believe we Canadians have some reason to be grateful, and some reason to practise ourselves.

It strikes one that there is a real difference between our two nations. Anyone who thinks that there is not a Canadian personality has not looked very far. Anyone who thinks that Canadian nationalism is not a real feature of our life has not compared the way in which we look at the world with the way in which the world appears to some others—particularly as between our two countries, which are commonly regarded as being, if not exactly identical twins, then certainly siblings, belonging to the same family. In many ways that is true.

In our political institutions we approach matters from quite a different standpoint, and that affects the way in which we deal with each other and the way in which we look on each other's problems. The American congressional system is so different from ours in its day-to-day workings. Each congressman, whether he is a member of the House of Representatives or a senator, is, in a sense, an independent power centre in a way which would never be ascribed to a member of the Canadian Parliament, whether in this house or the other.

In the United States they have an independence of the overriding control of party interest in a way which is not to be found in this country. They have a freedom, it seems to me, to represent local interests in a way which we sometimes find to be difficult when we have to reconcile local interests with the national interest.

Our parliamentary system, which perhaps binds us too closely to the chariot wheel of party discipline and prime ministerial power, means that we approach the problems between our two nations, and the problems of our policy-making, from quite a different point of view from that which they have down there. It is true that the congressional system is a far more open system for making laws and raising taxes than we have ever found in this country. While I do not espouse the congressional system, I am sure that there are features in it which we shall adopt in this country.

So, there is a difference in our political institutions, and it is marked these days because the American Congress is much more assertive now with respect to its relationship to the American executive than it was a few years ago. Anyone who has tried to negotiate with the Americans on a subject such as the Garrison Dam project soon finds that out, because while the Department of State may be easy to get along with and may give the assurances one requires, when it comes to the real crunch we find that there is another actor on the scene, namely, the American Congress, which deals with these matters in quite a different way. It is not good enough to have the Department of State on one's side if Congress is not disposed to agree. That is a fact that has certainly been borne out, as far as I am concerned, since I have conducted some activities in that respect.

Hon. Charles McElman: We found that out when dealing with the fisheries question.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, Senator McElman, is a veteran of this association, and knows well the problems that we face.

There is a difference of economic ethos, if I may use that rather fancy word, between the two countries, because, particularly in the United States today, there is a thrust towards individualism, as expressed in economic terms, that we do not find, and never have found, to the same extent in this country.

We are much more inclined to realize the necessity for collective action in many of the things we do in order to sustain our existence, with our particular geography and with our combination of populations, which means that we have, economically speaking, a different approach from the Americans, and it is good for Canadians like me to remember that because, in dealing with them, those things have to be taken into account.

There is a third difference which is so obvious as to be tiresome—that is, the difference of scale. It is simply a question of size, wealth and power. The difference is so disparate that it has to affect the attitude they bring to their problems and the attitude we bring to our relationships with them.

In the first committee of the three that were in action, one of which I had the great honour of co-chairing, we were right up against some of the most contentious issues that now exist between the two nations.

There was a dead set made, understandably so, on what was perceived down there to be unreasonable Canadian nationalism.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What was the name of that committee?

Senator Roblin: I do not know. The first committee did not have a name; it was just called Group 1, and was given an agenda. The only differentiation between the committees was based on the agenda each was given.

On the agenda we were given, the question of FIRA and national energy policy were two important concerns. There was a clear feeling, among many representatives from the American side, that our bout of nationalism, as expressed in FIRA and the National Energy Program, represented serious obstacles to close understanding and economic co-operation between the two countries.

There were some points made that we Canadians would do well to pay attention to, because I, for one, have no intention of abandoning my right to be a Canadian nationalist if I want to be one. There are ways and means of doing things which make it possible to achieve results with less trouble than one would otherwise expect. The points made to us are worth noting.

With respect to FIRA, there was a feeling of frustration because there was no evidence of due process to be found in the whole operation. There were no clear rules that people felt they had to comply with if they appeared before FIRA. It is considered to be arbitrary, bureaucratic and secretive, they said. God knows, all those charges, in my opinion, are perfectly true. I think we can have FIRA combine with a system of due process so that justice is not only done but is seen to be done by all concerned. What is wrong with that?

Then we come to the National Energy Program. The retroactive and non-compensatory features of Bill C-48 in relationship to the Canada lands are obviously objectionable to everybody. Senator Hayden reported to us on the subject matter of that bill, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. That committee found that parts of this bill were retroactive and that full compensation for seizure, if you wish to use that strong expression, was not provided.

It seems to me that those two aspects of the NEP could be reconsidered by thoughtful administrators of the government to eliminate, in my opinion, unnecessary features of the bill. Even if you are the strongest advocate of the National Energy Program that can be found in the whole length and breadth of the dominion, I think you can still—

Senator Frith: That sounds like me!

Senator Roblin: If it sounds like my honourable friend, then perhaps I can give him a little task. The task I give him is to persuade his colleagues that this legislation can be modified with respect to the retroactive provision, and improved by providing full compensation when government moves in on somebody's private property. I suggest those two improvements to the NEP as it stands now.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): When you started you said you were not going to raise contentious issues.

Senator Roblin: Well, I did not think my honourable friend would find it contentious to be opposed to retroactivity and non-compensation for government seizure. I do not think he does find it contentious. In fact, if he thinks about it for a minute I am sure he will agree that I am on a soundly grounded principle here, even though the government may not be.

Senator Olson: The facts don't fit your opinion.

Senator Roblin: Well, I am not claiming that my opinion is always correct. I am taking advantage of an opportunity to express a warning to my honourable friend. I am not trying to make this speech to make the minister of state in charge of economics and regions, or whatever, annoyed with me. I am trying to point out to him some of the problems we found with respect to the United States that we need not have found and we need not have if we are just a little more discreet and sensitive and not quite so thrusting in our policy.

Senator Olson: That part I accept.

Senator Roblin: Well, that is good, and I think you will accept more of it, too, before I am through.

Another question came up that I ought to warn the Senate about, and that is the concept of reciprocity. I think of reciprocity as being a term covering a general set of policies with respect to trade between countries. That is the meaning of reciprocity in the Canadian historical experience. But reciprocity is a term that is being used in a new sense in the United States, and what it means is quid pro quo or pro pelle cutem—a skin for a skin, if I may use the motto of the Hudson's Bay Company, with respect to individual items of trade: "If you want to send your trucks into our country, then you have to change your rules so that our trucks can go into your country". "If you want your potatoes to come over the border into Montana, then you have to do something about potatoes coming over into Maine". One could go through an entire series of individual idiosyncratic problems, one by one, on which reciprocity is demanded by some American legislators. To my mind, that is a fatal policy on which to approach matters of trade. Reciprocity, in those terms, is dangerous.

The point I want to make is that there are quite a number of people in the United States Congress who think that this form of trading is only fair and that things should be done in the way they suggest, so that particular items of trade are dealt with on an even-stein basis. That is the kind of reciprocity they want to see. Fortunately, as far as I can tell, the American administration does not agree that that is a good idea. It is amusing, though, because we spent some time talking about Canadian investment in the United States, which is quite the opposite turn of the coin. We found the Americans to be just as touchy nationalists as we are when it came to real estate investments in Denver, or an apartment building in San Francisco, or the movement of Canadian insurance companies into the United States.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Or ownership in Florida.

Senator Roblin: Actually, I think they rather approve of that; at least, it seemed to go down rather well. The point I am trying to make is that they are sensitive to exactly the same kinds of issues as we are.

I do not intend to detain the Senate very long on this matter, because all I have been saying so far is the common stock of our understanding, and current gossip as it affects the state of relations between the two countries. I am aware that I am really adding nothing to the fund of knowledge, although my opinion may be of some interest to myself, even if it is not to the honourable minister opposite.

What is the challenge for Canadians? What does this mean to us? What can we do about it? What attitude should we develop with respect to this matter? There is a natural defensiveness on our part. It came out throughout these meetings, because when Lilliput is faced with Gulliver, Lilliput feels it is up against something pretty substantial. That is the case here: we are defensive because we are dealing with a nation which is a giant.

However, I do not think there is any necessity for us to abandon our concern over our national identity. I do not think there is any necessity for us to give in on any of the great principles of independence or sovereignty, which, of course, form part of our idea of Canada, even though we do share this one continent with such a great nation. I am satisfied that there are no absolutes in this field, either between Canada and the United States or between Canada and any other country. The old-fashioned notions of complete and absolute sovereignty and independence, in economic terms, at any rate, we now realize can no longer be sustained. We have a very close economic integration. When we disturb that, there are going to be economic costs, and no matter how good those notions may appear to us or how easy they may be to digest in theory, they are certainly going to be something that has to be weighed in the balance.

Canada is not a nation that should be owned abroad—and there are very few Canadians who would disagree with that statement—but if we want to get on in our relations with the United States, I think the first point to consider is that we should strengthen the hand of our friends in that country—and Canada has plenty of friends in the United States; it has plenty of friends among those who were present at the meeting to which I refer. We must see that our friends' hand is strengthened, and we must mitigate the abrasive and strident actions that we have sometimes taken in respect of nationalism and our economic relationships with the United States in recent times. Reasonable modifications, to my mind, do not involve loss of face or loss of self-respect; they are just a sensible way of carrying on business.

Defensive policies in the United States, in my opinion, are sometimes offensive to Canadians as well. I go back to my example of FIRA. When one considers the lack of due process in the whole of the FIRA system, surely that is just as offensive to Canadians as it is to any American. I think we would do well to see how we can provide a more open system of dealing with FIRA applications so that the parties concerned may not feel that they have been smothered in a secret and bureaucratic decision in which they see no right or justice.

As I have already said with regard to the National Energy Program, we can deal with the questions of retroactivity and compensation if we want to. I believe that to persuade the Americans of the desire of Canadians to have a bigger share of their own natural resources, in the field of oil, is not a problem for us. They are open to persuasion, but we cannot persuade them, as we would like to, if we retain in that policy irritants which are not basic to the scheme at all and which should be altered in order to present a more neighbourly face to our neighbours at a time when we are doing things which are strengthening our own system of national ownership but which are, at the same time, acting against their obvious economic interests in this country.

So it seems to me that that is the major lesson I learned at the meetings in Florida this year—the necessity to strengthen the hand of our friends. If we do that, then our friends in that country are willing to speak on our behalf. They are willing to present, to those Americans who do not understand the differences between our two countries, our case effectively and reasonably, I believe, to avoid the more unpleasant repercussions that are talked of in some circles. But in order to strengthen the hand of our friends, we have to show ourselves to be reasonable and understanding in those things which concern them and which they regard as harsh and abrasive in our policy, and which we could well mitigate without sacrificing our goals or in any way derogating from our national dignity, if that is a concern of those engaged in the negotiations.

Personally, I think that the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group meetings are one of the important means by which we can strengthen the hand of our friends, because those meetings are between elected people—that is, some elected people and some unelected people, but basically—

Senator Frith: Parliamentarians.

Senator Roblin: Parliamentarians, that is the correct expression.

• (1450)

I think that this type of meeting is something which should be supported in this house. We might consider ways and means of doing more about it, but it represents a reasonable way of expressing the Canadian point of view, of finding a basis for understanding, of strengthening the hand of our friends in the United States while at no time taking away from the essential interests of this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have not been informed by any other senators who were present at the meeting that they wish to speak to this inquiry. I do not see why we should not keep it open, in case some other honourable senator wishes to speak to it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in that case. I move the adjournment of the debate, to leave it open for other honourable senators who might wish to speak to it. Then, if no one rises to speak to it next week, we shall consider it debated.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

APPENDIX

(See p. 4273)

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Thursday, June 3, 1982

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its Second Report as follows:

1. Your Committee, to which was referred the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs respecting the establishment of the position of Deputy Speaker of the Senate, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, May 12, 1982, examined the said Report.

Your Committee agrees with the opinion expressed in the Report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee that "if the Senate... can choose any senator 'to preside as the Speaker' during the Speaker's absence, then it can choose the same senator each time. If the same senator can be chosen each time, then the Senate can at the beginning or during the course of a session, as a matter of convenience, exercise that right and make its choice known in advance of being informed of the Speaker's unavoidable absence."

Your Committee, consequently, recommends that Rules 10 and 66 be replaced by the following:

Absence
Speaker

10. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66 to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if he is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker until the Speaker, or the Speaker pro tempore, as the case may be, resumes the Chair.

Committee
of Selection

66. (1) At the commencement of each session, a Committee of Selection consisting of nine senators shall be appointed whose duties shall be to nominate

(a) a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore;

(b) the senators to serve on the several select committees.

Separate report

(2) The Committee of Selection shall, within the first five sitting days of each session, present a separate report to the Senate in respect of its nomination of a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore pursuant to paragraph (1) (a).

Term of appointment

(3) Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the senators nominated under this Rule shall, when their appointments are confirmed by the Senate, serve for the duration of the session for which they are appointed.

2. Your Committee which is empowered by Rule 67(1)(e) "on its own initiative to propose to the Senate amendments to the Rules from time to time", has examined Rule 49 and recommends that it be replaced by the following:

Voice
vote

49. (1) When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and the "nays" and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.

Speaker's decision final Standing
vote

(2) In the absence of a request for a standing vote, the decision of the Speaker is final.

(3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.

Pecuniary interest

(4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which he has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

Voices equal

(5) Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker shall in all cases have a vote. When the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

Respectfully submitted.

H. de M. Molson,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 8, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE H. CARL GOLDENBERG
THE HONOURABLE SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD
THE HONOURABLE FREDERICK WILLIAM ROWE
THE HONOURABLE RHÉAL BÉLISLE

FELICITATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I very much regret that because of a family emergency I was not in the chamber last week when honours bestowed on two of our distinguished members were noted by honourable senators. The Deputy Leader of the Government and others spoke of the honorary degrees recently conferred upon Senator Buckwold, by the University of Saskatchewan, and on Senator Rowe, by Memorial University, Newfoundland. They are significant honours accorded to two outstanding senators. I repeat, I deeply regret that I was not present in the chamber when this recognition of them was brought to the attention of honourable senators.

I am most pleased, however—and I know that honourable senators will be in accord with this sentiment—that yet another honourable senator has been honoured. At a convocation in Toronto last Saturday, York University conferred an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws on the Honourable Senator Carl Goldenberg.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Quite a collection.

Senator Perrault: Senator Goldenberg is already the holder of the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from McGill University, L'Université de Montréal, the University of Toronto, and the University of British Columbia. This is a further honour conferred on an outstanding Canadian and an outstanding senator. All three honourable senators, and many others who have received similar recognition in recent weeks and months, have brought further distinction and honour to this chamber. Together with all other senators, I am pleased to note and to recognize these distinguished achievements.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to join the Leader of the Government in extending our congratulations to Senator Goldenberg who has just added one more doctorate to his already impressive collection. I imagine that in referring to all those who received distinctions and honours, the Leader of the Government also included Senator Belisle, who was made a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL CONSUMPTION STANDARDS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-107, an Act respecting Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour of presenting the report of the Standing Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 4301.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that the report be considered at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, June 9, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development who, on several occasions last week, disputed my contention that the trend of the value of the Canadian dollar, vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar, was down, down, down.

In view of the fact that the Canadian dollar closed at another all-time low today, may I ask the minister what the attitude of the Government of Canada is in this matter? Is it the view of the government that this is a blessing that will boost our exports? Is it the view of the government, on the other hand, that it is a problem with regard to prices of our imports? The Governor of the Bank of Canada has said that there is nothing magical about the 80 cent figure. Is that the view of the government? Is it the view of the government that the Canadian dollar is over-valued or under-valued vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar? Is it the view of the government that any new policies are needed in order to strengthen the Canadian dollar?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has asked so many questions that if I were to give a full and accurate reply to all of them it would involve a rather long speech.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: It would be the same in each case.

Senator Olson: However, I am sure that the honourable senator understands that. I believe there were five questions, in total, in which he was asking for the view of the government. I suppose that if he asked the questions seriously he does not expect to receive a reply from me to all five of them right off the top of my head. But I will take them as notice and get serious replies to what I presume are serious questions.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Have you decided to change your methods?

Senator Olson: No, it is very consistent with the method—

Hon. David Walker: It's the same old garbage.

Senator Olson: —I have used for a long time. The Honourable Leader of the Opposition will realize that, unless the preamble to a question is of no importance, it is a requirement that it also be dealt with. Otherwise, if there is nothing said in the preamble and it requires no response, then it ought not to have been said. Of course, there was a bit of a speech with regard to this question, and there have been other questions asked with a five-minute preamble.

However, on a somewhat related matter, I am sure that Senator Murray would like to hear, for example, that the trade surplus increased, from March of last year to March of this year, by $290 million, and that the cumulative trade surplus for the first four months of 1982 is now $5 billion, or $3 billion more than it was for the same period last year.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: You are copying the Leader of the Government.

Senator Olson: Of course, those figures have a certain relationship. The honourable senator should also know that the value of the Canadian dollar, relative to any currency but more particularly the U.S. currency, is the result of a reaction that comes from the market place.

Senator Murray: Exactly. Taking the statements of the minister at their face value, how does he explain the fact that the international money markets are manifestly voting "no confidence" in the Canadian dollar and, I suggest, in the policies of his government?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has a bad habit of overstating things—

Senator Perrault: Dreadful!

Senator Frith: Bring that under control.

Senator Olson: —when he says that the money markets have manifestly voted "no" with regard to the Canadian dollar. I think Senator Murray would be somewhat better informed, or more capable of making an interpretation, if he would listen very carefully to what a number of the members of cabinet, including myself, have said many times, not only in this chamber but in a number of other places, and that is that the reaction that shows up in the market place vis-à-vis the relative values of the currency also has something very directly to do with costs and the competitive position of our economy vis-à-vis other economies.

It is a fact that the level of withdrawal of inflation in the United States has been substantially more than in Canada. Indeed, if you want more precision, recently there have been some month-to-month calculations where the inflation rate in the United States has been down to very near zero. At the same time, our inflation rate—and I admit that our calculations are based on the same month, from year to year—is many points above the rate in the United States, which has a direct relationship to how the market will interpret the relative values of currencies.

We have constantly been attempting to persuade, not only the opposition—

Senator Flynn: Come on; be serious.

Senator Olson: —but also the Canadian people that there has to be a corresponding decline in the rate of inflation in our economy, for a number of reasons, including what I regard as the most important one, that being so that we are in a competitive position to take advantage of the market opportunities that are out there now, and, more particularly, so that we are in a position to take advantage of any upturn in the international market when it occurs.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have a final supplementary question. Because the minister did not mention these factors, may I ask him whether the government excludes the possibility that the national energy policy, the operations of the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the size of the federal deficit, which now looks as though it will be closer to $20 billion than the approximate $10 billion forecast last November, are factors in the precipitous decline in the Canadian dollar?

● (2010)

Senator Olson: My honourable friend continues to engage in what I regard as a rather bad habit. He throws in some adjectives related to rhetorical matters when he asks for information to be given in an accurate and responsive way. Of course, one is not compatible with the other, unfortunately.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Not compatible with your answers, either!

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to give us the benefit of the government's view of Canadian policy requirements now that the Versailles summit is over.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that, of course, is a major question. I would think it appropriate to bring to the Senate a post-Versailles statement in order to reply more properly to the honourable senator's question, and I would be prepared to bring to the Senate such a statement.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, today in the other place I believe that the Minister of Finance made a statement with respect to the Versailles summit. Among other things, he said that it did not indicate any change in economic policy. He then went on to say that Canada fully supported the findings of this Versailles summit. Does that mean that the government is not anticipating any changes in its economic policy as a result of the proceedings at Versailles?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will defer to the Honourable Senator Olson, who has some information with respect to the Versailles summit.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): What I have, honourable senators, is a copy of "blues" from the Question Period in the other place this afternoon. I was trying, in vain, to find the statement of the Minister of Finance. He did have the communiqué that was issued after the Versailles summit. In addition to that, he answered a number of questions of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place and one or two other members. I do not see a statement, as such, made by the minister, unless the amalgam of the things I have mentioned is what my honourable friend refers to.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I can clarify my thoughts on the subject for the minister's benefit.

The minister in the other place cited the terms of the Versailles communiqué, which he said were fully supported by Canada and which did not indicate any change in economic policy from the Versailles point of view. My question is: What does the minister mean by this statement that he supports the communiqué and therefore indicates that we can expect no changes in economic policy? Is that correct, or may we expect changes in the economic policy?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He said both things.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, although I do not have in front of me the exact quote that is attributed to the Minister of Finance, I think that the main thrust of the economic policy as set out in the budget speech of last November—which is an attempt to reduce the rate of inflation in Canada significantly and to endeavour to stay in balance in that regard with our trading partners, particularly the United States—still applies. The minister went on to point out that the statement coming out of Versailles and the thrust of that economic policy are consistent.

What Canada had indicated before, during and after the Versailles summit, however, was the hope that there could be some reduction in interest rates in the United States—and I do not need to go through all of the factors involved in that—so that sooner, rather than later, there could be the beginning of economic recovery in that country, its very size being such that it has a significant influence on the rest of the western world. A number of times we expressed disappointment that the real rates of interest in the United States have now risen to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 8 to 11 per cent. We also expressed the hope that there would be some action taken to bring those interest rates down, which would result in some confidence for investment all over the western world, including Canada, and which would stimulate the private sector to get on with economic recovery.

● (2015)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we are all familiar with the government's efforts to blame everything on the United States.

Senator Flynn: Or on the opposition.

Senator Roblin: The government refuses to accept any responsibility for its domestic dilemma.

Allow me to ask my honourable friend a question on the communiqué from Versailles, the main point of which was a pledge to reduce budgetary deficits. Would my honourable friend relate that pledge—which was endorsed by the Canadian government—to the fact that the budgetary deficit, estimated to be around $10 billion about eight months ago, is going to be much higher? The probabilities are that it will be somewhere between $15 billion and $18 billion. What action is the government taking to put some meaning behind its lip service on this question of reducing the government's deficit?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, so that there is no misunderstanding about what was asked and responded to in the other place earlier today, I have before me a copy of what was said, and the tenor of the question is the same. The Minister of Finance stated:

Madam Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the tenor of the question of the honourable member.

In this case I think it was Mr. Wilson.

Is he suggesting at a time of very deep slack in the economy and at a time of very grave and rising unemployment that the government should be taking a more restrictive fiscal policy than the policy that was laid out in the budget? If he is suggesting that, then I think he is recommending a policy that the Government of Canada will not follow, or indeed would not think to be in the best interests of the Canadian people at the present time.

What my honourable friend is aware of, of course, is that the total of any increase that may show up in the budget as different from the projections made in November would be almost entirely on the automatic compensators that we have in Canada on the expenditure side.

If the honourable senator is recommending, as appears from the tenor of the question put by his colleague in the other place, that we reduce the fiscal stance and, therefore, cut off some of those automatic compensators, I think he can take from the answer given by the Minister of Finance that we are not contemplating that kind of action.

Senator Roblin: How circumstances alter cases, because I remember well that, when discussing some point about budgetary deficits with the minister when the budget was fresh in our minds last November, he made a strong point of telling me that it was a good budget because it would bring the deficit down.

At the time he was discussing the budget he said that it was a good thing for Canada. Everyone now knows that it was a disastrous budget in terms of developing the economy of this country. The budget was such a disaster that the deficit is now going to be many, many billions of dollars more than we were told, and to tell me now, as he apparently is trying to do, that in spite of that admitted disaster, now to be seen on every side, capped off by the non-performance of the Canadian delegation at Versailles—

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Roblin: —he intends to do nothing about it—

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Roblin: What is shameful about that? What did our delegation at Versailles do that justifies the suggestion that they performed to some degree? It was a non-performance.

Hon. Lowell Murray: They inserted one word in the communiqué.

Senator Roblin: If they inserted one word in the communiqué, that was probably one word too many.

Senator Perrault: You asked for a statement on the Versailles summit, seeking information, and now you have made a judgment before you have had the facts.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has made a judgment, because he said "Shame!" If that is not a judgment, I should like to know what is. If my honourable friend would just keep his seat while I finish my question—

Senator Perrault: Statements like that destroy confidence in this country.

Senator Roblin: If anyone is responsible for destroying confidence in the Canadian government, it is certainly not members of the opposition—although I wish it were. The government created this lack of confidence by its own wilful acts, and if my honourable friend, the Minister of State for whatever-his-department-is, ever gets into the debate on the national economy, which we were invited to move, and to which no leading government figure has spoken so far, I shall be interested in his statement.

An Hon. Senator: He is hanging his head in shame.

Senator Roblin: Hanging his head in shame? No, I think we will hear from him, and I will be interested in hearing what he has to say. The point is, we went to Versailles and did not get what we thought we were going to get. We—that is, the government—said to the people of Canada, "We are going to do something when we come home." I am now asking my friends opposite if they are going to make a change in policy, and I get a stone wall.

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: Not a stone wall at all.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is amazing. The enthusiasm with which my honourable friends opposite, and particularly Senator Roblin, can display that their hindsight is almost as good as the foresight of the government never ceases to surprise me.

Everyone knows that there has been a downturn in the economy since last November. There were some projections then of that happening—

Hon. G. I. Smith: Yes, we told you.

Senator Olson: Oh yes, you know everything with your hindsight.

Senator Smith: Hindsight? We told you back in November.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about some good news? You have none.

Senator Olson: I have a file on good news too, but I never get asked any questions that allow me to produce it, so I will have to plant some questions of that kind with my honourable friend.

In any event, to go back to the reply to my honourable friend's inquiry, if that is what it was—"submission" is perhaps a more accurate expression—there obviously have been some changes. He now claims some superior wisdom, I guess, in suggesting that Canada ought to be able to insulate itself from the effects of the international market, and all that is involved therein; but the facts out in the real world are that Canada's economic activity and its gross national product are made up of something like 30 per cent in international trade alone, and when that sector faces the kind of difficulties we have witnessed since last November, effects are produced in Canada which in turn affect the people as to employment levels and all of the other things. It also has an effect on the deficit.

Senator Perrault: They know all that.

Senator Olson: They know also that our revenues are down. The Minister of Finance has indicated that.

It must also be remembered that we have a social system that we can be proud of, at least on this side of the house, having brought it into being with the object of mitigating a great deal of the suffering that goes along with this kind of downturn, but obviously the costs of some of those services have gone up. We do not intend to abandon those people who are in the greatest degree of distress.

Senator Smith: Only because you put them there.

Senator Roblin: I am sure it will comfort a great many of the people who are suffering to know that this government proposes not to abandon them. Since when has the government supported them in this economic downturn? Very infrequently indeed.

My honourable friend says that my hindsight is as good as his foresight. Well, that does not say much for my hindsight, because his foresight is zero. It is below zero. His foresight is a minus quantity. All you have to do is compare that budget statement we got with the facts that have emerged from it.

Senator Perrault: Be fair; don't be so political.

Senator Roblin: I am still asking my honourable friends the same question I started with. Are we going to get some changes in policy on the part of this administration, or is it going to stand with its head in the sand? Can you stand with your head in the sand? Well, ostriches can, so I suppose my honourable friends can. When are we going to get policies that deal with these problems?

[Senator Olson.]

It is no good blaming the problems on the rest of the world. The world has its troubles, to be sure, but we have ours, and those that were self-created by Canadians, and by the government opposite, are susceptible to some improvement and change. When are we going to see some changes in policy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, in Versailles right after the summit, and the Minister of Finance since he came back to Canada, have indicated that the Government of Canada is going to look carefully now at the economic situation—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: —in view of the circumstances that are now even more clear as a result of the Versailles summit discussion, and the Minister of Finance will be bringing a statement to Parliament reasonably soon. I guess that is the answer. I suppose my friend is going to ask me to give him a further definition of "soon".

● (2025)

Senator Asselin: Six weeks.

Senator Olson: Six weeks has been mentioned, but the Minister of Finance indicated in the other place today that that was somewhat of a misinterpretation, and what was said was that it would not be prudent for us to wait until the fall before some action was taken in Canada to adjust even more readily to the economic situation in the real world. My honourable friend can rant and rave—and he does that very well and very often—about how we try to blame other people. Blame it on the Americans—

Senator Asselin: Blame it on yourself!

Senator Olson: —or blame it on somebody else, and so on.

Senator Flynn: Blame it on the opposition!

Senator Olson: No, I do not want to blame it on anybody. I think that it would be more useful if we were to spend a few minutes, or perhaps a few hours, recognizing that that is the real world. We did not create the situation in the international market.

Senator Flynn: You certainly helped to create it.

Senator Olson: We have done as well as any other country in coping with that situation and with our policies, I think, to some extent, better.

Senator Flynn: It is not as bad as all that.

Senator Olson: Therefore, if my honourable friend wants to spend a lot of time making the argument that somehow we created this situation internationally, I think that he might as well do something more useful than constantly spinning his wheels on that one because the people of the country know better than that.

Senator Flynn: You should try to ask for their opinion in an election.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows better than that, too, because he knows I am not blaming him for the international situation, as he just stated. I am blaming my honourable friend for the national situation. I think it would be a good thing if the honourable gentlemen opposite would sometimes admit that their policies are at fault. I think it would be a good thing if the honourable gentlemen opposite would recognize that their policies have brought about the lowest state of confidence in the economy of this country on the part of ordinary people, on the part of businessmen and on the part of everybody concerned that we have seen since the great depression. That is the fact of the matter, and we are asking my honourable friend if he will kindly do something about it. I am not going to ask him to define the word "soon" because it is perfectly obvious that he does not have the faintest idea of what they are going to do, or when they are going to do it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether there has been any change in the forecast rate of economic growth and in the forecast size of the budgetary deficit contained in the November budget of Mr. MacEachen?

Hon. Jack Marshall: "Yes" or "no".

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance has indicated he will be bringing in a statement about that and other matters related to economic matters very soon, and I am sure my honourable friend would not like me to try to pre-empt the Minister of Finance's responsibility in this regard.

Senator Murray: I am not asking the Minister of State for Economic Development to pre-empt the Minister of Finance; I am simply suggesting to him that it is approximately seven months since Mr. MacEachen brought in his budget, and that the GNP declined during the first quarter of this year by, I think, 1.7 per cent. In view of that, do the ministers have an up-to-date figure on the forecast budgetary deficit and on the rate of economic growth? Are they working on new assumptions, or are they working on the some old assumptions, now completely discredited, brought in by Mr. MacEachen in November?

Senator Smith: Are they working at all?

Senator Olson: My friend has a severe difficulty in relating certain things to other things that he admits himself are so. I can understand that kind of logic. We know that when there is a turndown in the GNP that there is also a related and a corresponding turndown in federal government revenue. He understands that very clearly.

Senator Murray: Then quantify it for us. It has been seven months.

Senator Olson: He also knows and understands that when there is this kind of turndown, there is also a very direct related increase in expenditures for a number of programs including—

Senator Murray: How much?

Senator Olson: —such things as unemployment insurance and many other programs.

Senator Murray: Tell us how much.

Senator Olson: I said earlier the Minister of Finance said—

Senator Roblin: Flying blind!

Senator Olson: —in the other place today that very soon he will be making an updated statement on all those factors that my honourable friend mentioned. I do not have one with me this evening.

Senator Murray: Are you working on one?

Senator Olson: I am sure the Minister of Finance would not have said that unless he was working on one. Of course he is working on one.

● (2030)

Senator Perrault: It will come sooner than you wish.

Senator Olson: If the Minister of Finance said he is going to bring it in, obviously he is working on it.

Senator Perrault: Night and day.

Senator Murray: The Minister of State is in charge of economic development policy. Surely he and his officials are working on some new and updated assumptions with regard to the rate of economic growth in the country. If so, what are those assumptions? Let him give us the figures.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Murray knows very well that the Minister of State for Economic Development does not bring in and publish separate and independent statements of what was asked for a few minutes ago—and the honourable senator keeps shifting ground a little. A few moments ago he asked for an update on the size of the deficit. Now he comes back on a little different tack. The honourable senator has to realize that all of those things are related. The Minister of Finance has the responsibility, and he has given an indication that he is going to bring in an update. As soon as I can get my hands on it, I will see that my honourable friend is informed on every one of the questions he has asked.

Senator Perrault: We will rush it into the Senate.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question, which is based solely on what I have heard in this chamber tonight. I heard the Minister of State for Economic Development say several things.

Senator Perrault: All intelligent.

Senator Donahoe: One was that in the United States they have succeeded in wrestling inflation to the ground. He has told us that there are monthly reports indicating that inflation is minimal in the United States. He has also told us that in the United States they have very high interest rates, and that because they have high interest rates, we also have high interest rates; and because we have high interest rates, then we have high inflation. We have increasing inflation.

As a rather naive person, from a remote part of the country, I would like an explanation of what the minister is saying. If it is true that inflation has been wrestled to the ground in the United States, to what policies of the Reagan administration does he attribute that very large measure of success; and if those policies work in the United States, why are they not available in Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to answer that question seriously, and say quite simply that I did not say any of those things. I never once used the words "wrestled to the ground".

Senator Perrault: You are wrestling the truth to the ground.

Senator Olson: The way I should answer that question is to say that the honourable senator has put his interpretation on what he thought he heard. It is unfortunate that he has a somewhat distorted interpretation of it. I would suggest that he obtain a copy of Hansard as early as possible tomorrow and read the replies very carefully. He will then have a full and complete answer to the last part of his question.

Senator Donahoe: Then I will rephrase my question tomorrow, and ask it again.

Senator Flynn: In any event, the minister will recall that the Prime Minister said at Versailles that the policy of high interest rates up to now has only had the effect of wrestling the economy to the ground. Does the minister agree with that?

Senator Olson: I believe I missed one or two words. Would the Leader of the Opposition please rephrase his question, because I want to be precise in my reply.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister said that high interest rates, as a way of fighting inflation, has had only the effect of bringing the economy down. Do you agree with that?

Senator Olson: Here again, it is the Leader of the Opposition who is the champion of bringing in slightly different interpretations.

Senator Flynn: If you don't know, say you don't know.

Senator Olson: I recall seeing that press report. I know it is wrong to comment on whether press reports are true or untrue, but nevertheless—

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Olson: I will refer the question to the right honourable gentleman whom the Leader of the Opposition claims made the statement. I believe that what the Prime Minister said was that one of the consequences, if you like, of high interest rates over a long period of time is to wrestle the economy to the ground, and in his view that was undesirable.

Senator Flynn: Then how can you reconcile the government's continuing with the high interest rate policy?

Senator Olson: First, I wish to tell my honourable friend that this government does not have a high interest rate policy. The Minister of Finance said that some time ago. If the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we do, then I suppose he is also suggesting that he is in favour of some kind of direct intervention, and, indeed, even foreign exchange control, and all of the other things that go along with setting out a policy concerning interest rates. You cannot have one without the other, and my honourable friend knows that better than anyone in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Do we understand that the minister is saying the government will do nothing about the high interest rates that prevail now?

Senator Olson: You cannot make that assumption from what I have just said.

Senator Roblin: Why not? It is a perfectly logical deduction from what my honourable friend has been telling us.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend wants to ignore these things in debate. I guess this is the period for debate rather than the Question Period. In any event, let me say that this government does not have a high interest rate policy. What this government has is a policy of free movement of capital into and out of Canada, and therefore the market, and the factors at work in other countries, particularly the United States, have a direct relationship on all of that. If the honourable senator is going to suggest that we have some kind of high interest rate policy different from that freedom, then I guess what I said a few minutes ago follows—and I am surprised that my honourable friends opposite are supporting that kind of statement.

Senator Roblin: If this free situation really exists, can my honourable friend tell me why it is that the Bank of Canada just finished borrowing $750 million in Europe to support the Canadian dollar? If it's a free dollar that we have in this country, why is it that several billion dollars have been committed to its support recently, and more billions of dollars are in reserve in case they are required to support that delicate currency? If that is a free market, then it is an odd definition.

Senator Olson: If my honourable friend wants to take the time to read it, there is a committee report in which the Governor of the Bank of Canada indicated the purpose and the extent of the bank's intervention in the market, which is to take off some of the very wide fluctuations from time to time, and that ultimately the market will decide what the level is.

Senator Roblin: That has to be unmitigated nonsense, because the Governor of the Bank of Canada is the man who sets the bank rate, does he not, by his purchases and activities in the market, and that bank rate is translated into the interest rate in Canada? If my honourable friend says that is not controlled by the Bank of Canada and the government, then surely he should think again.

Senator Smith: He had better think just once.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise another matter with the Leader of the Government. It has to do with the supply of credit for the agriculture industry in Canada. If I recall correctly the government made a policy announcement the other day that it intended to modify the Farm Credit Act so as to make it possible for that body to have a wider source of funds, namely, to borrow from the private sector, either in this country or abroad. Can my honourable friend tell me when legislation in respect of that matter will be presented, because I do not believe it has so far been received?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

ASSISTANCE FOR FARMERS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not his correct title.

Senator Bielish: Approximately two weeks ago a delegation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, comprising some 60 persons across Canada, made urgent representation to the government for immediate assistance in the form of emergency financing for debt consolidation at 10 per cent interest rates to farmers facing disaster. They were led to believe that something was going to happen fairly soon. My question is: What is going on? Is anything happening to help farmers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I attended part of the meeting referred to by the honourable senator. I am not sure that I concur in what she claims they were led to believe. That is possibly a matter of perception. In any event, I will refer the question to the Minister of Agriculture, and hopefully the honourable senator will receive a quick reply. As a matter of fact, I believe that some of them had a meeting with the Minister of Finance as well.

I will try to bring in a response indicating what is happening with regard to that representation.

Senator Bielish: I have received a letter pointing out that this is an urgent case for farm credit assistance, on a selective basis, for lower interest money or debt refinancing through the Farm Credit Corporation. This letter is simply to restate the urgency that something be done in this farm credit crisis and to ask that before Parliament adjourns for the summer recess the government make a concrete response to this request by stating what it plans to do to live up to its commitment.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe the response I gave a few minutes ago will cover part of my honourable friend's question.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the very serious, indeed, grievous, war in Lebanon where the death rate is very high and destruction is increasing. Can he indicate what the attitude of the Canadian government is in this regard, and how and if it has conveyed its attitude?

I am led to believe that the Prime Minister said in Europe that, while Canada was concerned about this, it would not condemn it because the Israelis were not involved in occupying the country. One might think that killing is at least as serious as occupation.

What has been done by Canada to express our nation's view of this very serious breach of peace.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the Israeli ground attack on June 5, a letter was delivered to Prime Minister Begin from Prime Minister Trudeau, which urged restraint in Lebanon. Following the appeal by the Versailles summit leaders on June 6, our ambassador in Beirut conveyed Canadian concern to the Lebanese government about loss of life.

Our embassy at the counsellor level spoke to the PLO in Beirut on June 6 to regret the loss of life, and to call for an end to military activity by all parties.

The Canadian chargé made a démarche in Jerusalem on June 7, conveying the Canadian government's position. He expressed concern at the loss of life and escalation of the conflict. He delivered a copy of the summit appeal and supported Security Council Resolution 509 of June 6, calling for a ceasefire and the immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanese territory.

The embassy in Israel has also conveyed our shock and revulsion at the attempted assassination of the Israeli ambassador in London.

We are monitoring the situation closely through reports from our embassies in the region.

Our embassy continues to function normally, and informs us that all staff and dependents in Beirut are safe. Some non-essential personnel and dependents have gone, temporarily, to Damascus and Amman, or to less exposed areas near Beirut.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE MILITIA—RUMOURED REDUCTION IN BUDGET

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on May 18, 1982, concerning the rumoured reduction in the budget allocated to the militia. I have some information from the Minister of National Defence.

Honourable senators, since the answer is quite lengthy, I would ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate. Then, perhaps, Senator Marshall and others may wish to comment. I would be most pleased to read it if honourable senators so desire.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The only comment I should like to make is that I asked the question on May 18, and the Minister of National Defence gave the reply during the proceedings of the External Affairs and National Defence Committee. The news release is dated May 19. This is June 8, and the Leader of the Government stands up and gives me an answer now. I have had this information in my office now for three weeks. What is the good of asking questions?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Marshall possesses psychic powers. I wonder if he is certain that the reply I have before me is identical to the material he has in his office. If Senator Marshall already has the information, I will withdraw my offer.

Senator Marshall: It is in my file of replies.

Senator Perrault: If Senator Marshall has five pages of detailed information about the militia, and he is satisfied with the information he has, I will withdraw my request to incorporate this document in the record.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think it should be incorporated. Then we can verify that the news release contains the same information as that given by the minister.

Senator Perrault: I might say that the Leader of the Opposition, on this occasion, seems to have a more constructive attitude than does Senator Marshall—

Senator Flynn: Beware!

Senator Perrault: —in his earnest search for information. I shall be glad to provide this information.

An Hon. Senator: It is a duplicate.

Senator Perrault: If it is a duplicate, then no harm will be done.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of answer see Appendix "B", p. 4303.)

INDUSTRY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on June 1 by Senator Nurgitz relating to Dome Petroleum Ltd.

I am informed that the newspaper account quoted by Senator Nurgitz, suggesting that Dome executives had met with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the month of May, is unsubstantiated. The minister last met with Dome Petroleum executives on March 23, 1982.

PRIVATE BILL

E.G. KLEIN LIMITED—THIRD READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the third reading of Bill S-26, to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

[Senator Marshall.]

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when this bill was considered in committee, I raised several pertinent questions regarding the manner in which company directors tried to explain away certain administrative oversights. I was reluctant to give a blanket approval to the present bill, whose aim was to revive a company that had been declared dissolved by the authorities responsible for administering the Canada Business Corporations Act. The company had been declared dissolved for good reason. Under the Canada Business Corporations Act, all companies must file an annual report on their activities with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On the basis of these reports, the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs prepares statistics that are extremely important in connection with the guidelines to be given to certain companies.

In the present case, the committee heard evidence that for five years the company had never answered requests for information or completed the forms sent to it by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Furthermore, we were also told that there was so little interest on the part of the company that its president was, in fact, living in Germany. He was sent the forms but failed to meet the requirements of the act by completing a form which was to be returned to the department. The excuse was that the company did not become aware of the dissolution until five years after the fact, and when it did, it claimed that it had not been informed by registered letter to the effect that it had been dissolved. The department had abided by the provisions of the act, by publishing a notice in The Canada Gazette to the effect that the company in question had been dissolved because it had not complied with the requirements of the act. Today, we are being asked to revive this company.

The point I raised in committee is that Parliament should not be used frivolously. In the circumstances, I would have preferred that instead of filing a petition to have it revived, the company had applied for another charter.

An attempt was made to put the blame on the officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. From testimony given before the committee, I received the impression that an administrative oversight had been clearly committed by the company. It is said that we shall have further bills of the same kind in addition to the one we are considering now. I do not intend to let them be passed as easily as before. Fortunately, there is a provision in the new Canada Business Corporations Act which enables the Director of Corporate Affairs to correct an administrative error which until now we have had to deal with through legislation. The new act is now in effect. Thus in future, we shall not have to consider cases such as the one now before the Senate. I therefore have no objection to the third reading of this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If I understand correctly, the blame is not always placed at the door of the government. It is possible that companies made mistakes too.

Senator Asselin: That is what I said.

Senator Frith: I got the impression that you meant it was poor management.

Senator Asselin: By the department?

Senator Frith: Not the department, the companies.

Senator Asselin: I wanted to show the committee that the president of the company had neglected his business. When five years are allowed to go by without anyone looking after the administrative side of a business, without reporting to the Corporate Affairs Branch, it means that interest in it is flagging. The departmental director was quite right in saying that if no one is looking after the company, it means that they do not want it to exist. At that time, the decision was made to dissolve the company. I do not think we can blame the director of the department. I think it was the fault of the president of this company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill C-102, to amend the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is part of the original omnibus energy bill and helps to implement that part of the National Energy Program where the government stated that an early increase in the share of the oil and gas sector owned by the federal government was desirable.

Petro-Canada is now participating in the full range of activities of a national petroleum company and will remain the principal direct policy instrument of the Government of Canada in the oil and gas industry. However, as was noted in the National Energy Program, the government is committed to competition. It must ensure that competition is preserved both in the privately owned sector and in the smaller, publicly owned sector. This amendment to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act will give the government, under the control of Parliament, the authority to establish new crown corporations in the energy field.

This power will allow the government to act in two ways: to procure the incorporation of a corporation under the Canada Business Corporations Act; or to acquire federally incorporated companies to become crown corporations. In either case, this may only be done for purposes strictly limited to the energy sector, as described in the bill. Finally, the bill explicitly gives authority to Parliament to reverse a decision to proceed with the establishment of a crown corporation.

The amendment strikes a balance between providing the government with the authority necessary to effectively manage Canada's national energy challenges while, at the same time, providing Parliament with the new powers to scrutinize and revoke the use of this authority.

It should be emphasized that the provisions provided in this bill to establish such corporations are limited. Corporations to be acquired must be federally-incorporated companies. As I mentioned, companies may only be established as crown corporations for purposes strictly limited to the energy sector, as described in the bill. The bill sets out those purposes as follows: first, to explore for, develop, produce, gather, handle, refine, process, purchase, sell, import, export, distribute, store and transport all types of fuel and energy; second, to produce, distribute and market energy conservation technology; third, to conduct or engage or participate in energy research and energy conservation research; and fourth, to acquire and hold shares or assets in organizations carrying on these activities.

I would like now to focus my remarks on the balance between the powers given to the government and the powers reserved to Parliament.

The first point that could be made in this context is that the power given to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to acquire or create corporations must be approved by order of the Governor in Council. In other words, a single minister is not being endowed with broad powers to establish crown corporations.

The second point is that companies that are acquired or incorporated may only be established as crown corporations for the energy related purposes mentioned in the bill.

The third point is that any order of the Governor in Council made under this amendment is subject to a negative/affirmative resolution procedure in Parliament. Specifically, the bill requires that an order of the Governor in Council be laid before Parliament not later than 15 sitting days after it is made. Pursuant to an amendment proposed by the government at the report stage, the order comes into force on the twentieth sitting day of Parliament after it has been laid before Parliament, unless before that time a motion, signed by a minister, for the consideration of the House of Commons, to the effect that the order be confirmed is filed with the Speaker of that house, or, if no such motion has been filed, a motion, signed by 30 members of the House of Commons, to the effect that the order be revoked is filed with the Speaker of that house.

A motion for a negative resolution can only be filed if no motion for an affirmative resolution has been filed. Where a motion for an affirmative resolution has been filed, if the House does not adopt the motion the order is revoked. Where a motion for an affirmative resolution is adopted by the House, the Senate will have an opportunity to look at the order. If the Senate concurs with the House, the order will come into force. If the Senate does not concur with the House of Commons, then the order is revoked. Therefore, the power of the second chamber is reserved in every respect in connection with the affirmative resolution.

Where a motion for a negative resolution is filed, if the House does not adopt that motion, the Senate has an opportunity to consider the order, if a motion to the effect that the order be revoked is signed by not less than 15 members of the Senate. If the Senate concurs with the House, the order enters into force. If the Senate does not concur with the House, the order is revoked. It should be noted that the Senate itself cannot initiate a negative resolution; it can only be initiated in the House of Commons. In that respect, there is a departure from the ordinary parliamentary procedure.

It should also be noted that the amendment proposed by the government at the report stage provides for the situation where there is a dissolution or prorogation of Parliament. In this case, an order that has been laid before Parliament but that does not come into force is revoked.

I would like to discuss at this point the question of the negative resolution provided for in this bill. As honourable senators will recall, this matter came up before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in connection with Bill S-24. That bill, I believe, was the fifth bill in a series of bills confirming approximately 29 tax treaties. That bill also provided for a negative resolution to the effect that to rescind a regulation established by Order in Council, the negative resolution must be passed by both the Senate and the House of Commons. The result of that provision was that if the House of Commons overwhelmingly voted in favour of revoking an Order in Council or regulation, it would still be proceeded with as long as the Senate concurred. I think everybody got mixed up, because they had not realized that, although there should be concurrence of both the Senate and the House of Commons for an affirmative resolution, following the same logic, to revoke it you only need the concurrence of either house. This was pointed out in committee, and I might say that it was really pointed out because of the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments in July 1981, which specifically drew attention to this problem. I might say that it recommended that all subordinate legislation not subject to a statutory affirmative procedure should be subject to being disallowed on resolution of either house.

As honourable senators are aware, Bill S-24 was reported to this house with recommendations respecting the amendment of the bill to provide for a negative resolution that could be passed by either house. That has since been referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I must say that, when I look at the terms of reference of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, I cannot understand why it was so referred; however, that is not under consideration tonight.

Honourable senators, when the omnibus energy bill was first proposed, it contained the same kind of negative resolution provision that we objected to in Bill S-24. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments wrote a letter on March 31 to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources pointing this out to him and suggesting that the bill should be amended. In spite of the fact that the bill was split up, no attention was paid to the suggestion that it be amended. It still provided for the type of negative resolution that we had objected to in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

I can recall that, at the time we proposed an amendment to Bill S-24, the Honourable Pierre Bussières, Minister of State (Finance), appeared before our committee and objected very strenuously to any amendment whatsoever regarding the negative resolution. However, this question was raised at the committee stage in the House of Commons. Still there was no amendment. At the report stage, however, on May 17, an amendment was proposed which substantially took care of the objections which had been raised in our committee regarding Bill S-24. There are two variations: first of all, we had recommended that a negative resolution could be initiated by a petition signed by 20 members in the House of Commons or 10 in the Senate. The original energy bill provided, I believe, that 50 members in the House of Commons and 20 in the Senate must sign such a petition. That was later amended to 30 members in the House of Commons and 15 in the Senate. Why they did not accept our suggestion of 20 and 10, I do not know; I think it was just to be a little contrary. The logic behind the number 20 was that a third party should have the opportunity, if it was made up of a reasonable number of people, to start the ball rolling.

The other objection I have to the amendment is that it provided that the Senate itself could not initiate a negative resolution. This in effect, is contrary to the principle of our bicameral system. Why that was done I do not know, because under the previous provision, which required passage by both the Senate and the House of Commons, either house could sign a petition. Under this amendment, the Senate cannot do a thing unless the House of Commons begins the procedure.

One of the potential uses of the amendments proposed by Bill C-102 is the acquisition of the shares of a federally incorporated energy company in order to establish it as an independent crown corporation and not as part of Petro-Canada. Another potential use arises out of the provisions of the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which was passed by Parliament last year and proclaimed on March 5, 1982. That act provides that a 25 per cent crown share shall be reserved in interests in the Canada lands. Section 31 of the act provides that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may direct that the crown share in any relevant interest be transferred to a designated crown corporation, or that a crown corporation transfer a crown share to another crown corporation.

For reasons similar to those which argue against concentrating all oil and gas acquisitions in Petro-Canada, it may be that crown shares should not be concentrated in Petro-Canada and that one or more additional crown corporations should be established to hold and manage the crown shares of oil and gas interests in the Canada lands.

The third potential use of the amendments proposed in this bill is less hypothetical than the first two. It involves an energy company which already exists as a subsidiary of Petro-Canada. The company is Canertech, the renewable energy and conservation technology investment company. Under this amendment, Canertech could be separated from Petro-Canada and established as an independent crown corporation.

Honourable senators, this bill was the subject of an extensive examination by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Energy Legislation. Witnesses who appeared before the committee included the Auditor General and counsel for the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Two amendments were recommended by the committee. First, a new subsection of section 6 was recommended to ensure that no crown corporations established under this bill shall procure the incorporation of a subsidiary corporation to engage in activities other than those referred to in subsection 1. Secondly, another amendment was adopted by the committee that would add a new subsection 8 providing that, when a corporation is incorporated pursuant to subsection 1, the minister shall, not later than the fifteenth sitting day of Parliament after the incorporation is incorporated, give the reasons in the House for the incorporation of the corporation.

Honourable senators, I commend the principle of this bill to the Senate and ask for your support on second reading. I might point out that a pre-study of the subject matter of the bill is being carried out by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, because it is a matter of some urgency.

As honourable senators are aware, when one moves second reading of a bill, he is often supplied with a speech prepared by officials of the department which, although I find very helpful, I do not usually use extensively. I thought, however, that I would read to you part of the second-last paragraph of this speech, which deals with the negative resolution that I have been discussing.

As a result the government has proposed an amendment at report stage which was considered to be infinitely preferable and which is contained in the bill now before the honourable senators.

If it was so infinitely preferable, I do not know why it took them so long to agree to make the amendment.

It provides for a procedure that more closely replicates the regular legislative procedure.

What I suggest is that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee should consider not whether it more closely replicates, but whether it should not closely replicate and therefore permit the Senate itself to institute negative resolution procedures.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might put a question to the sponsor of the bill. I am intrigued by the comparison of subclause 2 of clause 10 to subclause 2 of clause 11, dealing with the consideration of a motion by the Senate in both cases. In one case the Senate has five days to consider the motion, and in the other case it has six days. Why the difference of one day?

Senator Godfrey: I have not the vaguest idea. The honourable senator's eyes are sharper than mine, and I think it is a good question to ask in committee.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I was about to move the adjournment of the debate, but before I do perhaps my honourable friend has a question he would like to ask.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I thank my honourable colleague. I do wish to put a question to the sponsor of the bill with reference to the provisions of what appears to be the new section 6, as contained in clause 1 of this bill, and combining the meaning of that with the meaning of what appears as subsection (3) of new section 6 on page 2 of the bill. New section 6(1)(b), on the first page of the bill, gives the crown corporation, among its rights, that of acquiring "all of the issued shares of any corporation incorporated or continued under that Act." I take that to mean it is not restricted at all. Any existing corporation, private or otherwise—

Senator Godfrey: Incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Senator Smith: Yes—has an unrestricted right to acquire. The use of the word "acquire" intrigued me, and I became more intrigued when I looked over to the next page and saw section 6(3), which states:

● (2110)

A corporation is for all purposes an agent of Her Majesty and its powers may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

Does the phrase "is for all purposes an agent of Her Majesty" include "expropriation"? Is that why the word "acquire" is used in the other subsection, rather than "to purchase or receive as a gift"?

Senator Godfrey: I do not think that the use of the word "acquire" really has any significance as to what the position is of the corporation after the shares are acquired, bought or whatever.

Frankly, I noticed that in another subsection these corporations can be sued and be subject to all the ordinary liabilities any corporation is liable to. So, I frankly do not know what the significance is of the phrase "is for all purposes an agent of Her Majesty." I suppose we shall have to wait until the committee stage to find that out.

Senator Smith: I am sure that the committee will find that out.

Senator Godfrey: That is a good point, though.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I am rising to adjourn the debate, but before doing so, I should say that I heard with interest that a certain committee of this house is pre-studying the bill. I assume that, in due course, we will receive a report from that committee on the bill, and that that report will come before the Senate. It seems to me one should have the benefit of that report before one proceeds with the debate.

I see my leader shaking his head as if he had some doubt on that question, and I fully admit that I am a novice in these surroundings and that perhaps I am wrong, but it occurred to me that that would be so.

For personal reasons, which are unavoidable, I will have to leave Ottawa early on Thursday afternoon, so if the suggestion I am about to make, that the debate not be resumed until the committee has reported, which seems to me to be totally reasonable—I see my honourable friend the Deputy Leader of the Opposition shaking his head, so it is obvious that I am not on solid ground. If it is felt that the debate should be continued then I shall move that it be adjourned. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government would assist me in this regard.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, from one novice to another, I think the normal procedure, as far as pre-study of bills is concerned, is that the bills are pre-studied on the assumption that they will be referred to the appropriate committee after second reading. It is in order to debate the bill on second reading—that is the debate on the principle of the bill—and then refer it to the appropriate committee, have the committee report to the house, and, with the benefit of that report, possibly have further debate on third reading.

I think it is quite in order for the honourable senator to adjourn this debate, as he intends to do, knowing about the pre-study, but also knowing that at the conclusion of the debate, the bill will be referred to the appropriate committee, which will continue its study of the bill.

Senator Smith: That is on the assumption that it receives second reading.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, there are various reasons for conducting a pre-study of a bill. This pre-study was initiated so we could conduct some study of the bill a week or so before we actually received it, because we knew that the bill would be referred to the committee and that passage before June 30 was requested.

The pre-study so far has really been an education not only on this bill but on other energy bills. The committee's advisors are educating the members of the committee on the contents of the bills so that they can plunge right into the real study of the actual bills after they receive second reading. So, there will be no report from the committee on the pre-study of the bill.

Senator Frith: That is, as Senator Smith correctly pointed out, if the bill receives second reading.

On motion of Senator Donahoe, debate adjourned.

PETRO-CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 1, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for the second reading of Bill C-101, to amend the Petro-Canada Act.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, when the minister introduced this bill in the House of Commons he said that it was fulfilling the Liberal Party's 1980 campaign promise to strengthen and expand Petro-Canada as an instrument of national policy.

I do not propose at this time to go into any philosophical argument for or against government ownership and intervention in industry. Even the most convincing arguments in favour of private enterprise or co-operative ownership by the people of Canada, as espoused by the Government of British Columbia in 1975, would be redundant at this point.

The Canadian people have now been weaned on the idea of a government-owned oil company, and I suspect that that state of mind has become irreversible. Therefore, I propose instead to look at this bill on its face value as a piece of legislation designed to carry out Petro-Canada's original mandate.

[Translation]

As I recall, when Petro-Canada was established, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us that this corporation would be pursuing three major objectives. First, it would help Canada to achieve self-sufficiency; second, it would act as an intermediary in dealings with the governments of producing countries which prefer to negotiate between states; finally, it would keep the government informed about the evolution of the industry, which would enable it to develop more appropriate energy policies.

This bill provides for an increase in the authorized capital of Petro-Canada from $500 million to $5.5 billion. This capital will be used for the same exploration activities by Petro-Canada. The government therefore hopes that this accrued capital will allow this crown corporation to meet the objectives set out when it was created.

This $5.5 billion capital must meet the needs of Petro-Canada for the next six and a half years. This will bring us very close to the end of the present decade, by which time we should be self-sufficient according to the first objective mentioned. Are we asking too much? Could it be that self-sufficiency does not depend on the success of Petro-Canada, which until now has been restricted mostly to acquiring existing reserves? Could it depend mostly on government policies, of which Petro-Canada is the instrument? In other words, could it depend on the major administrative policies of the government?

Even with a capital of close to $6 billion, Petro-Canada must work in conjunction with other companies in the private sector if we want to become self-sufficient.

Is it wise to say today that the development successes and future projects of these companies can give us self-sufficiency by 1990? On the contrary, everyone tells us that operating capital is becoming scarce and that profits are going down.

Moreover, the November 12 budget has substantially reduced the cash flow of businesses in spite of the incentives provided for by the National Energy Program.

And what about the ongoing conflicts between the producing provinces and the federal government? A surplus of supplies may have slackened the tension between Alberta and Ottawa, but the matter of ownership of offshore resources in Newfoundland is certainly as hotly contested as before.

Moreover, at its last international meeting, OPEC stated that oil prices would once more resume their upward movement. Member countries even noted that the prices had rebounded much more quickly than their own experts had expected. In other words the cutbacks in production are already giving results. Oil supplies are decreasing and prices are on the increase. Are we soon going to be caught once again in a new spiral? I know that some of the projects which have the potential to make us self-sufficient could then be restarted, but I am afraid that the false starts that we have already had will give us still more trouble in the future.

● (2120)

[English]

Therefore, the government's first goal of self-sufficiency seems to be escaping us for reasons other than Petro-Canada's cash flow position.

The second aim was for Petro-Canada to serve as a bargaining agent for our government with other governments for the purchase of imported oil. Here again, I fear that other government priorities interfere with Petro-Canada's mandate. It certainly serves as an agent, but decisions to import oil or use up domestic supplies rest with the government. This is the sort of situation which in the private sector would be tantamount to telling a manufacturer, "You are responsible for signing export contracts, but we will tell you how much of your input will be imported and how much will be available from secure and lower cost domestic sources." It must be difficult to make businesslike decisions when the methods are so unusual and contrary to normal practices.

When looking at Petro-Canada's annual report, we see an item on page 25 which states:

Expenses increased to $2,286.8 million from $716.0 million in 1980 reflecting a full year's purchases of Mexican crude oil—

Under the heading of "Revenue", the report expresses with delight that its increase in operating revenue of $1.9 billion is the result mainly "of including a full year's revenue from Mexican crude oil, imported by the corporation in accordance with Government of Canada directives, amounting to $680.0 million compared to $11.8 million in 1980."

By a simple calculation we see that expenses went up by $1.5 billion, whereas the purchase of Mexican crude amounted to nearly $700 million. I would say that would leave very little earned on increased sales volumes and prices in the refined oil products segments. The report says that the remaining $279 million, over this $1.9 billion, which came from the crude, came from these increased sales volumes and so-called higher prices. I would submit that it was a slight increase in sales volume in proportion to higher prices.

It would appear at first glance that Petro-Canada looked very much like an importer of oil, and not so much like an instrument of national policy, in 1981, unless importing oil rather than finding and producing it here is the ultimate national policy.

Perhaps I am not putting in all the great activities in which Petro-Canada was involved during the year, and that is why its successes in fulfilling its mandate do not look as good as they actually are.

The last objective of Petro-Canada's mandate is to give the government a window on the industry. I would submit that it is now well ensconced in the livingroom, if not in the bedroom, of the oil industry, having come in not by a window but by the back door. Notwithstanding the trampled feelings of private companies, foreign owners and investors, I do not propose to raise the issue of private versus public enterprise, or of discouraging investments as such. Instead, I would like to look objectively at the results Petro-Canada obtained for the government in having this window on the industry.

Is the government better informed about what goes on in the petroleum industry as a result of the creation of a crown corporation? If so, then it must have been known to the government that the National Energy Program would affect the companies' cash flow and hamper the industry's progress. Obviously, they have not listened to PetroCan, because they certainly know of these problems through their partnership with these private companies.

The government must have known that the National Energy Program would make investors and rigs flee down south. It must have also been foreseen that our own investors would be looking for a better return elsewhere, not to mention a climate more favourable to doing business. The uncertainty created by the National Energy Program, combined with the November 12 budget, certainly is not conducive to businesses making plans or taking risks as required in the exploration industries.

The government must have realized also that the brain drain would be accelerated. I would say that it was very much aware of this since it made that arrangement with Imperial to keep Cold Lake alive. This bill requests authority to repay $50 million to Petro-Canada for the standby fees which were involved. I believe we had until July 1982 before that $50 million loan was called. I do not see how the project can be revived between now and then, and I ask myself: Will we lose our experts?

It must also have been known that the buy-back movement started by the National Energy Program and the PIP grants to Canadian-controlled companies would unleash an onslaught on our dollar, just at a time when it is in trouble. Yet, when we consider the fact that Mr. MacEachen had to appeal to banks not to lend any more to companies for take-overs, because of the negative effect on our currency, we can only wonder whether the window is, in fact, rather opaque.

Bill Wilson, the national business columnist, commented recently to the effect that Esso Resources' $600 million deal with a group of smaller companies, some not even in the oil and gas business, is a direct product of the National Energy Program's discriminatory features.

The resulting consortium, Mr. Wilson says, can now qualify for 80 per cent grants, but some of the companies are in the real estate or investment business, with no more gas and oil experience than filling up a company car at the service station. Mr. Wilson goes on as follows:

Because Esso Resources is the only company in the consortium with the technology and experience to run a project as difficult as this one, it will become the project operator's agent, doing the actual work of the lead company, Home Oil, which does not have the experience.

Mr. Wilson concludes:

This situation illustrates with stark clarity the degree to which Esso Resources and other companies like it are needed in Canada, whether they are ultimately controlled in the U.S. or Timbuctoo. It is not just the company that controls the leases, it is the only one of the lot with any ability to explore them.

Mr. Wilson warns that "before anyone gets carried away by enthusiasm over the Canadianizing aspect of this consortium, it would be just as well to remember that the last burst of Canadianization did much to weaken the dollar by shipping $10 billion out of the country. It rigidly locked the country into substantially higher interest rates than would otherwise have been necessary, despite Washington's levels... It also helped determine its depth and severity.

With the government having a window on the industry, could it not have foreseen that its National Energy Program would lead to exactly the opposite of what it was aiming for—that is, it would give a weaker dollar and higher interest rates, and put major projects under the control of foreign firms, while leaving weaker, inexperienced or even non-petroleum-related firms as the Canadian element in the exploration? Meanwhile, our expertise and funds are looking for happier climes.

I would advise the government to take a closer look through that very expensive window. If the whole petroleum industry in Canada winds up letting the world go by, it will not be Petro-Canada's fault; it will be the government's fault, for not believing what it sees through that window, or ignoring it so unfortunately.

Bill C-101 also requests that a payment of $55 million be made to Petro-Canada to fund Canertech, the currently wholly-owned alternate resources company. Rumour has it that Petro-Canada is not too keen on this payment. We can also wonder what the purpose is of this payment, since it is also rumoured that Canertech is about to be spun off as a crown corporation on its own.

From reports on Canertech's performance since its creation a year ago, it would appear that this fledgling corporation has yet to learn how to fly alone. There are grave doubts being expressed in industry circles over its business know-how. Perhaps Petro-Canada does not like to have an offspring that competes with it, but for the good of the people of Canada, a second look should be taken at Canertech and its usefulness, before any further funds are allocated, or it is set up on its own.

[Senator Charbonneau.]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, following on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, tabled on May 6, and the Order of Reference to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee on May 12, the Standing Senate Committee on Rules and Orders held meetings at which was discussed the best way to give effect to the recommendations of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

As the Senate has a long-standing system of selection at the beginning of each session, it was felt that the same method might be used for the nomination of a candidate for the office of Speaker pro tempore.

We are all aware that the Committee of Selection set up at the beginning of the session is appointed by the leaders of the parties in the Senate through the medium of the whips and is, therefore, a suitable body for such nominations. This view led to the amendment to Rule 66, which you now have before you, and the consequent amendment to Rule 10, which is different, but in keeping with the recommendation of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I trust that the chamber will find itself in agreement.

I should like to draw your attention to page 2187 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate dated June 3. You will see in the report the recommendations on the changes to those rules. Fundamentally, it is recommended that Rule 66 be amended to provide not only for the appointment of a Committee of Selection, but also for the nomination of a Speaker pro tempore and the senators to serve on committees.

Rule 10 is amended in keeping with, but in a slightly different fashion from, the recommendation of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, so that "Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator" who has been chosen under Rule 66, as I have just mentioned, shall "preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if he is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence." That last part is not different from the existing procedure, which, is that whenever the Speaker is absent the Senate elects someone to act as his replacement.

There is a slight modification in Rule 66(2), which reads:

The Committee of Selection shall, within the first five sitting days of each session, present a separate report to the Senate in respect of its nomination of a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore pursuant to paragraph (1)(a).

That is merely to take care of the possibility of having to have the appointment of a Speaker pro tempore made immediately after the beginning of a session. The Speaker pro tempore holds that position for the duration of the session.

The second item on the agenda of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders was matter of a suitable method of dealing with the vote when some senators desire to abstain. It was felt that the long-standing method was unwieldy, unnecessary and unsatisfactory. Therefore, paragraph 2 of the committee report recommends an amendment to Rule 49 involving a simple form, in keeping with the parliamentary practice elsewhere, for the taking of the vote when there are some senators who decide to abstain. I trust that this will also be acceptable to the chamber.

In paragraph 2 of the report, dealing with Rule 49, the rule is set out slightly differently. It is broken down into five paragraphs but, essentially, it is the same. The "yeas" are recorded, the "nays" are recorded, and those who desire to abstain are also recorded. Those are the only comments I wish to make on those changes recommended in the rules.

The third item on the agenda of the committee was the matter of the ringing of the bell when a vote is taken. There was considerable discussion on this subject, but no conclusion was reached. Therefore, it was left to be dealt with at a later date, when it may come up again on our agenda. At present, it seems wise to leave it as it is.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to Senator Molson. If the reply is difficult I will share the responsibility with him, because I was present at the meeting of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee and also at the meeting of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee.

My question deals with the selection of the Speaker pro tempore. The rule says, "At the commencement of each session . . ." and normally this will apply only when we have a new session. We certainly are not at the beginning of a session now. This one has been going on for over two years. My question is: Does Senator Molson have a solution if we want a Speaker pro tempore right away?

Senator Molson: I will have to take that question as notice.

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION RE ALLOCATION OF SEAT NO. 15 TO SENATOR MANNING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a motion which I should like to put to the Senate.

There are today 19 members of the Privy Council in this chamber. Several others have recently left us. We have also five ex-premiers. All of these distinguished colleagues, with the exception of two, have graced the Senate by being seated in the front rows. The two exceptions are the Honourable Jack Austin and the Honourable Ernest Manning. As Senator Austin is a member of the Cabinet, I will not comment on the fact that he sits behind his leader. However, I feel that all of us would be honoured if Senator Manning were persuaded to occupy one of the seats in the front row.

• (2140)

Senator Manning holds the distinction of having been premier for the longest time of any one in the Parliaments of the Commonwealth. He was recognized, in part, by being appointed Companion of the Order of Canada over 12 years ago, and only a few months ago the province which he served so well acknowledged its debt to its former premier by naming him the first member of Alberta's Order of Excellence.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition paid great tribute to Senator Manning on December 2 last. Several other honourable senators added their compliments, and all members of the Senate were delighted to lend their support to the congratulations he then received.

I should like to propose that Senator Manning be invited to move down to the front row where seat number 15 is both vacant and available and where he would add further dignity to our chamber. As I am sure this is a non-contentious motion, under rule 46(s) I move:

That the Honourable Senator Manning, P.C., be asked by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition to occupy Seat Number 15 in the front row of the Chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hesitate to call the Chairman of the Rules Committee to order, and I am probably wrong in doing so, but I understood that the honourable senator would give notice of his motion and would speak to it in due course. However, he has already moved his motion and spoken to it. If he has already spoken to it, I take it that debate on his motion has commenced. I am not clear about this. I thought he would give notice of the motion, ask leave to proceed with it tonight and then make his comments, but he has already made them.

An Hon. Senator: Give him leave.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I would respectfully say to the Deputy Leader of the Government that I assumed that neither he nor the Leader of the Government or the Leader of the Opposition would object to my motion, and that it would be a non-contentious motion. If that is the case, then rule 46(s) applies. In other words, no notice is required.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I must take issue with that assumption. Again, I hesitate to differ from the honourable senator, who has been here longer than I have; but in the short time that I have been here I have not noticed the Senate picking seats for honourable senators. I suppose it is a possible way of doing it. We could debate the seating plan, and have the Senate as a whole deal with it, but I understand that is normally done by the whips.

We shall have to consider the motion and, since it is now before the house, I will move that the debate be adjourned. It seems to me that there is a procedural issue involved that needs some study beyond the question of the merits of Senator Manning.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, despite the technical difficulties mentioned by the Deputy Leader of the Government, we may assume that Senator Molson has moved his motion and has spoken to it. I do not believe the Deputy Leader of the Government is formally challenging the validity of the motion—

Senator Frith: No, I am not.

Senator Flynn: He is simply adjourning the debate. If that is the position, then we can all agree.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1983

JUNE 8, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, June 1, 1982, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (A) and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 1, 1982, to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (A) and heard evidence from the following: From the Program Branch of the Treasury Board: Mr. D. J. McEachran, Assistant Secretary; Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division; and Miss D. Spac, Program Analyst.

The Committee met and discussed Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983 for the Departments of Employment and Immigration, and External Affairs. The supplementary estimates for Employment and Immigration under Vote 15a total $95,096,000 for 'Employment and Insurance Contributions', and $19,000,000 under Vote 20a, for 'Immigration—Program Expenditures and Contributions'. For External Affairs, the supplementary estimates under $1 Votes 1a and 10a involve transfers of funds from Industry, Trade and Commerce to External Affairs as a result of the government's reorganization of the two departments. The transferred amounts are $346,830,000 for the Canadian Interests Abroad Program's operating expenditures and $113,159,508 for the grants listed under this program.

The Committee was informed that the supplementary estimates for Employment and Immigration in excess of the main estimates will be covered by envelope reserves mainly from social policy and economic development envelopes. Included in the $95,096,000 requested under Vote 15a were $19,000,000 of additional funds for the standard employment program—Summer Canada, which the witnesses considered to be a very successful program. This program will now cost a total of $119,000,000 and for the most part provides assistance to municipal and community non-profit organizations for the employment of students on a temporary basis. Part of the program, however, is aimed at providing jobs for students with government departments. This employment could lead to future careers with the department after the students have completed their studies. Another important element of the supplementary estimates is increased payments towards community development and service projects to provide jobs for seasonal workers during the off season. The Portable Wage Subsidy Program is to receive additional funding under these supplementary estimates for the provision of subsidies to employers who employ eligible workers. These subsidies are primarily intended to facilitate the transfer of workers to industries with better prospects.

The Committee was told that these programs are aimed at creating continuing employment, and therefore have established criteria to ensure that the job will be viable after a period of four years, when the subsidy expires. The Committee was informed that the cost of job creation programs will not be much higher this fiscal year than it was during the last fiscal year.

The supplementary estimates for the immigration program under Vote 20a provide for $1,200,000 for additional operating costs of detention centres and $17,800,000 for assistance to refugees arriving in Canada. According to our witnesses, these costs have increased primarily due to the longer time that refugee immigrants have to be assisted under present employment conditions. The refugees are now mainly from South East Asia and from Poland and qualify under the unsupported immigrant classification. The total number of refugees to be allowed is limited, although there are no limits on the number allowed entry from any particular country. There is currently only one detention centre being operated in Toronto by the department with a capacity for 400 refugees, most of whom remain in this centre for only a few weeks.

The transfer of funds from Industry, Trade and Commerce to External Affairs, presented in these supplementary estimates, completes the transfers that have been planned to date. However, other transfers may still be made, particularly of support units that may be required by External Affairs. Under Vote 10a the grants and contributions provided under the Canadian Interests Abroad Program are used for the promotion of exports through payments to Canadian corporations and organizations concerned with the broadening of Canadian export trade.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE MILITIA—RUMOURED REDUCTION IN BUDGET—DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

NEWS RELEASE

MAY 19, 1982

Ottawa—In response to questions from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and Defence, the Honourable Gilles Lamontagne, Minister of National Defence, confirmed last night that sufficient funds will be available during this fiscal year to permit payment for an average of 60 training days for each of the authorized 15,500 members of the militia.

The figure 15,500 represents the number of militia personnel approved by Cabinet and is generally referred to as the "paid ceiling".

Mr. Lamontagne also noted that the $58,022,000 allotted for Militia pay for the current fiscal year represents a 19.6 per cent increase over the 1981-82 allotment. These funds are intended for routine training activities.

In his remarks to the Committee, Mr. Lamontagne also stressed that the Militia has been the subject of a revitalization programme in recent years. New armouries have been constructed in several locations and improvements have been made to the land reserve's equipment inventory, most notably through introduction of the new family of armoured vehicles.

Mr. Lamontagne acknowledged that concern had been expressed in some areas regarding the amount of money initially allocated to local Militia Units for pay. He explained that this concern was due to the fact that some militia personnel were unaware that additional funds are held at Area Headquarters and Mobile Command Headquarters. These funds provide training days for centrally coordinated activities such as rank qualification courses, major exercises, etc.

Steps will be taken to ensure that the system governing the allocation of funds for pay is explained more fully to individual members of the Militia.

The Militia's budget is reviewed three times each year—in June, September, and January. In past years these reviews, have provided additional funds for requirements not previously identified or funded.

Mr. Lamontagne concluded his remarks to the committee by restating the government's commitment to continue its efforts to improve its support of the Militia.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

There has been a great deal of publicity on training funds for the Militia, particularly in the west and more specifically in Alberta. I wish to make a statement in this regard.

For FY 1981-82 NDHQ allotted $48,521K for what are considered normal basic activities. For FY 1982-83 the figure for the same activities is $58,022K or an increase of 19.6 per cent which is well above the normal cost of living increases. In addition, in 1981-82, $1,700K was provided for militia participation in the major exercise RV 81 which will not be repeated this year. Finally, there are three cyclical reviews completed each year in June, September and January. These determine if there are new requirements which were not evident or funded before. Last year a total of $2,962K was provided because of this, so the total funds issued in 1981-82 were $53,183K versus $58,022K at this time for 1982-83. Of course, the cyclical reviews will be conducted this year as well but it is too early to say what the outcome of those reviews will be.

The initial allotments which I mentioned for normal activities, $48,521K for last year and $58,022K for this year translate into 74.5 and 77.4 average man-days per man for the 15,500 authorized strength ceiling. Of course, these are average figures and do not apply to each and every man. Some will receive more and some less depending on what activities each undertakes.

Several factors may make it appear that militia funds have been reduced. These are:

- Recruiting has been very successful so the strength right now is well above the 15,500 authorized level and this reduces the average days per man;
- Last year was somewhat of an aberration because of the substantial amount of money provided as a result of RV 81 and other needs identified in the cyclical review;
- Funds are yet to be issued by FMC to cover the militia pay raise when it is announced;
- There has been some rearrangement of funding within FMC to cover increased numbers of personnel on centrally managed activities such as officer and trades training. Those mandates will be distributed by FMC and area headquarters.

In fact, however, there has been no degradation in militia funds, and at this point in the annual chain of events they are better off than they were in FY 1981-82.

CHART 1

($,000)

| ITEM | 1981/82 | 1982/83 | Increase |
|----------------------|--------------|------------------------|----------|
| Initial funding | 43,945 | 50,778 | 15.5% |
| Man-day trial | 3,146 | 5,814 | 84.8% |
| SYEP augment | 1,430 | 1,430 | — |
| DND allocation | 48,521 | 58,022 | 19.6% |
| RV 81 | 1,700 | (not applicable) | |
| Cyclical adjustments | 2,962 | (yet to be determined) | |
| DND funded total | 53,183 | (yet to be determined) | |

DND allocation of $58,022K in FY 1982/83 includes $50,683K for military pay which for an authorized strength of 15,500 provides for 77.4 average man-days per man.

SYEP (separate TB Funding) provides an additional $4,129K of which $4,028K is allocated for military pay which provides a further 6.1 average man-days.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I see that only one of the four ministers is present, but, of course, he is one of the most important. We also have present the Deputy Leader of the Government who, according to Senator Guay, is the only one who gives appropriate answers to questions. However, I have some questions for the Minister of State, Senator Austin. I do not know how to describe his responsibilities because they seem to be vague and, at the same time, vast. I would ask the deputy leader whether or not we can expect the Honourable Senator Austin to be with us later.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as I know, Senator Austin will be here. I believe Senator Argue is out of the country on government business to do with wheat sales.

Senator Flynn: Is there anything else he can do?

Senator Frith: I wish to add nothing at this time. Senator Perrault is also away on government business but he is in Vancouver. As far as I know, Senator Austin will be here this afternoon. I have not heard otherwise.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It should be noted that there are only nine of the total Tory caucus here.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The most important ones.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

BILL S-24—PROSPECT OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I see Senator Goldenberg coming into the chamber. I was wondering whether he can tell us when his committee will consider Bill S-24. I understand that some people are worried about the delay. The only matter standing in the way of passage through this house is a favourable opinion by the committee on the objection I raised.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: With regard to the objection raised, I expect to have an opinion this afternoon or tomorrow. As a matter of fact, there is a meeting on the matter this afternoon with the officials of the Privy Council Office and the Department of Justice.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, perhaps I should await delayed answers, but one of the very capable executive assistants of the Leader of the Opposition has brought to our attention something that we should have noted ourselves. That is the number of questions that are not being answered and that remain outstanding for some time. The reason I raise this point is because many of the answers have been published in newspapers or by other means. I wonder whether there is any point in asking questions if they are going to be taken as notice and not answered, and I wonder where the fault lies. How can we overcome this embarrassing situation?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that any questions remain unanswered is unsatisfactory. I do think, though, that to refrain from asking questions because there are a number that remain unanswered might be considered overkill.

I would hope that we do not have to suspend Question Period until all previous questions are answered.

As to the matter of responsibility for answers, the information I gave last week was wrong. I said that all questions are referred to the office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and are then distributed to the appropriate departments. That procedure only applies to those questions that are taken as notice, as distinguished from written questions placed on the Order Paper.

As for questions taken as notice, I think we can promise a substantial catch-up. I say that because we have more control over them.

Written questions placed on the Order Paper are dealt with, as I understand it, by the Privy Council Office and the Prime Minister's Office. As a matter of fact, I think Senator Murray suggested that. In the office of the Leader of the Government, we have what might be called some leverage, but we have less control over those questions than we have over the ones that are taken as notice.

However, I assure honourable senators that it is certainly my objective, and I know it is Senator Perrault's objective, to have as many questions answered as we can before we adjourn for the summer.

Senator Marshall: What I feel should be embarrassing to the government—and I do not say this unkindly—is the fact that a question I asked on February 18 on the McCracken Report was taken as notice, and that report was dealt with months ago by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

The recommendations in the McCracken Report were acted upon by the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Everything has been finalized, yet the question is still outstanding on June 9. Someone can find the answer to that question without even looking for it. That is how I got the answer, but the question is still outstanding as far as the Senate is concerned.

That is just an indication of what I have been saying—that there is a malaise in the system. Somebody does not care, or treats with disdain, the fact that we are owed answers. I point that out so that it will be corrected.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall has found the right word; it is exactly that—embarrassing.

As I said, we intend to put on a blitz. I hope we will be able to track down the reason for a question's remaining outstanding after such a long period of time. We intend to determine whether it is, as Senator Marshall implied, only a matter of things not being done or one of attitude.

Senator Marshall's point is well taken, and we will try to rectify matters during our blitz.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT'S SHAREHOLDING

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I see that we are blessed with the presence of Senator Austin.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Do you mean you are going to ask me a question after several silent weeks, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: I must say that we are a bit tired of putting questions to Senator Olson and getting no answers.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: We are getting a little tired of your questions.

Senator Flynn: You certainly should be, because, in your case, I can understand that you must be getting tired having to support a government in which you do not believe.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is you he is getting tired of.

Senator Flynn: I know it is tiring when you are always pointed at. Senator Steuart has said before that he endorses everything that the government is doing.

Senator Steuart: I said I thought they were grand chaps, and were doing a great job.

Senator Flynn: But you do not endorse everything?

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. C. William Doody: Why are you not on the front benches? They need someone like you there.

Senator Flynn: In any event, I am satisfied with the bit of doubt coming from Senator Steuart.

Senator Steuart: You made the suggestion.

Senator Flynn: Thank you very much. I am still trying to put my question to Senator Austin.

● (1405)

Among many other things, the minister is responsible for the CDC. Last week he made an announcement, and I wonder if he could indicate what the timetable is for the divestiture of the government's shares in CDC.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Flynn for his interest in the continuing saga of CDC. I had the pleasure of making an announcement—

Senator Flynn: Pleasure!

Senator Austin: —along with Mr. A. H. Hampson of CDC on May 27 with respect to the government's policy decisions relating to CDC. The effect of the decision was that the government would make its investment in CDC available for purchase to private investors. Part of the regime for that availability is a change in the restriction presently in the CDC Act of 3 per cent maximum shareholdings to individual Canadians. Of course, there is no right of ownership of CDC shares by foreign investors. The alteration from 3 per cent to a maximum of 10 per cent holdings by Canadians must be authorized by Parliament. It is proposed that after five years the restriction would be removed entirely, which also must be authorized by Parliament. I am hopeful that market conditions will allow us, in the next few months or perhaps in a year or so, the opportunity to reach a reasonable rate of return on our investment.

Senator Flynn: On the government's investment.

Senator Austin: Yes, on the government's investment. The sale of shares will have to await such time as the government can receive an appropriate return for its investment.

I should also like to advise Senator Flynn—

Senator Flynn: You mean "the Senate".

Senator Austin: —and the Senate that the proposal includes the establishment of a holding company to hold the shares of the government in CDC. It is intended that the advice of the directors of that holding company be taken as to the appropriate timing, pricing and circumstances for sale. I know the Senate understands that no minister of the Crown, of whatever government, is in a position to make decisions with respect to marketing equity shares. That is a very specialized field and requires that considerable specialization be brought to the task.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand that the government's decision to dispose of its shares in CDC came as a result of negotiations between the minister and the board of directors of CDC? I suppose this has been discussed with the board on a regular basis for many months.

Senator Austin: The decision was taken as a result of discussions with the president and chief executive officer, with the committee of the board and, on one occasion, at an informal meeting of the board of directors. The discussions with Mr. Hampson and his committee of directors involved a range of options to the government as an investor and to the present management, the directors and their shareholders. This particular choice was the one that was made by me and recommended to the government and approved by the government.

Senator Flynn: Did the minister have instructions from the government before he began those negotiations?

Senator Austin: There were no pre-conditions placed on my authority. I received no specific instructions. I was asked to bring back recommendations to the government. I was not directed in any way with respect to the recommendations to bring to the government.

Senator Flynn: I am asking that question because, if my memory serves me correctly, the minister told us shortly after he became a member of the board that he was there only as an observer and would do nothing about the direction of the corporation. He now tells me that he was there on his own initiative and that it was without instructions from the government that he began those discussions which led to the decision to dispose of the government's shares in the CDC.

● (1410)

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I want to clear up a question raised earlier in this chamber. I thought I had made it clear at that time that I am not a director of CDC, and I have not been a director of CDC. The government is represented by two ex officio directors, the Deputy Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who sit on the board.

However, at one stage of the deliberations about the future of the government, as an investor in CDC, I was invited to have a discussion with the board on an informal basis. I accepted that invitation and attended that particular discussion.

In answer to Senator Flynn's previous question, I said that I was in no way given any instructions as to an appropriate policy. I was asked to consider the range of policies and to bring my recommendations to cabinet. That I did.

Senator Flynn: We can probably resolve the obscurity of some of these replies with the ones I obtained previously.

With regard to the new wholly government-owned corporation, which is to hold the CDC shares, am I correct that the government intends to keep the name CDC, or, as it is in full, Canada Development Corporation, for this new organization?

The government will not only hold shares in what will then be the former CDC, but it is my understanding that it intends to acquire shares in other concerns. Can the minister tell us what those other concerns are and what the prospect is for this succeeding corporation?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I think my answers are clear and not at all obscure.

Senator Flynn: You mean, to these questions?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, continuing the answer concerning the CDC, yes, the government has decided to reserve the name CDC, but has not decided whether to use that name in the future. That question will be considered.

The holding company, Canada Development Investment Corporation, at the moment has only one assigned task, and that is to hold the government's shares of CDC. Any other purposes have not yet been formulated. The announcement I made indicates that, if there are future purposes, those purposes will be brought to Parliament.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: As a supplementary question, why would the government not just take its investment out instead of forming this holding company, if it has nothing in mind for it? What is the purpose of it?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I appreciate the question; I tried to answer it, in part, in a previous answer to Senator Flynn.

The purpose is to put between a minister of the Crown and the financial marketplace an intermediary that can provide expert advice on technical questions: questions regarding the financing of CDC itself; questions of pre-emptive rights of purchase in the case of voting dilution or equity dilution; questions relating to the orderly marketing of the government's position so as not to injure the investment value of the shares held by private investors in CDC; questions relating to the appropriate market size and the appropriate market number. As Senator Charbonneau knows, in these matters there are times when offers can be made and remain on the table for two or three hours.

I submit that a minister of the Crown cannot make these decisions and cannot have on staff, as public servants, the kinds of people who can make these decisions with respect to such an important commercial entity and an important commercial investment as is the CDC.

Therefore, the holding company is required, and has been created by the present board of CDC, in order to provide a place where expertise and guidance from appropriate people in the private sector can be given to the government in terms of this range of decisions and others that are of a purely commercial nature.

● (1415)

Senator Charbonneau: We do hope they are not the advisers who advised the government to pay 19½ per cent last November for the Canada Savings Bonds.

Senator Olson: What does that have to do with the question?

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN BUSINESS BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. He seems rather gloomy today at being forgotten; it is obvious that he does not like to be ignored.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs announced yesterday that, in the first five months of the year, business bankruptcies in Canada are up 36 per cent to 4,429, with liabilities up by 107 per cent to $817 million. Further, analysts say that actual bankruptcies represent only a relatively small portion of business failures.

Would the minister tell us whether this is an illustration of what the Prime Minister meant when he said that the present policy of the government was wrestling the economy down?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, that would be an incorrect interpretation of what the Prime Minister said. I do not believe there is any relationship between the two statements at all.

Senator Flynn: No relationship at all?

Senator Olson: No. Any attempt by the Leader of the Opposition, who has a great deal of skill in this regard, to suggest that the Prime Minister indicated that wrestling the economy to the ground is a desirable thing is absolutely incorrect.

Senator Flynn: I did not say that.

Senator Olson: What the Prime Minister said is that that is one way to deal with inflation, but he did not approve of it.

Senator Flynn: I did not say that that was the objective. However, the Prime Minister seems to say that the present policy of high interest rates has that result. The minister says that the increase in the number of bankruptcies has no relation to that. To what cause, then, does he attribute this high rate of bankruptcies, which is probably the highest that we have experienced, even during the depression of the 1930s?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would rather not try to relate some of the arguments that my honourable friend endeavours to put in the so-called preamble to his question, because even he is rather confused about any linkage between them. The fact of the matter is that there has been a severe downturn in the economy on an almost worldwide basis, and certainly in the economies of the nations of the western world. That does cause some difficulty for a lot of companies and individuals. We regret that as much as, and I would suggest even more than, the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

If my honourable friend wants me to give him a brief, precise answer, I will do so. It is the downturn in economic activity and in our export markets, in some cases in our domestic market, along with higher debt service charges which causes a great deal of difficulty in this country.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, accepting that there is a severe downturn in the Canadian economy, will the minister not agree that it justifies the withdrawal of the MacEachen budget of last November and the presentation of a new budget? I ask the question in view of an editorial that appeared recently in the prestigious American business and financial publication, Barron's.

After discussing the reports that wage and price controls might be imposed, and the attitude of the Canadian Labour Congress to that, Barron's says:

If Labour's love's lost, the government of left-leaning Pierre Trudeau—along with the country it has perennially misruled—must be in trouble. So it is. Thus, in a sweeping if self-defeating effort to achieve self-sufficiency in oil and gas, Canada launched an ambitious National Energy Program which to date has merely succeeded in curtailing domestic exploration and development, triggering a flight of capital and pushing chosen instruments like Dome Petroleum to the brink. Foreign exchange reserves have dwindled, to the point where, in order to keep the currency from sinking like a stone, Ottawa has borrowed heavily in the Eurodollar market. Owing to unbridled government expenditure, Canada is suffering from double-digit rates of both unemployment and inflation, yielding a misery index that would have made Jimmy Carter look good. The Prime Minister may cut a dashing figure at the summit, but his policies are the pits.

The question I put to the Minister of State for Economic Development is this. Now that the government has taken the step of raising our expectations by announcing that an up-date of its economic policies is coming, will the government not agree that a necessary first step is to withdraw what is left of the disastrous budget brought in by Mr. MacEachen last November?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I hope you have taken note of what I consider to be an example of the most flagrant disregard for the rules of this house that I have ever seen. I am referring, of course, to the reading into the record of the contents of editorials that suit the purposes of my honourable friend, followed by the pretence that they are the preamble to a question. In this regard, my honourable friend has gone farther than has ever been the case before. If that is the way the opposition wants this house to function, that is up to them; but what is happening is that we no longer have a question period conducted according to the rules, in terms of which members on both sides, but particularly the opposition, have an opportunity to seek information. Question Period is not for the purpose of giving information, but for the purpose of receiving it.

Senator Murray: I thought you might be interested in that, though.

Senator Olson: There are many more effective ways of communicating that sort of thing to me, but if you want to do it that way, go ahead.

I must say, however, that I completely disagreed with the preamble to the question, and wondered what the question was going to be, although I realized early on that my honourable friend's main purpose was to get the preamble on the record.

So far as the actual question is concerned, it seemed to me that my honourable friend answered himself.

There is also this contradiction. Senator Murray asks first of all whether or not there was to be some consideration of the economic situation as we know it now, and requested that the government come forward with a statement or up-date on economic policy, and that sort of thing. If that is to be done, there will certainly have to be consultation with the caucus, and, indeed, with the government, before we produce such a statement. At the same time Senator Murray says, "Would you agree to give us the result of that consultation first, namely, to disregard the budget?" My honourable friend knows very well that he answered his question before he asked it.

Senator Murray: Well, let me ask a supplementary question, which I hope will elicit a more direct reply.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): How about another editorial from the Toronto Sun? Try that.

Senator Murray: The minister's colleague, the Honourable Minister of Finance, has said, within the last 24 hours or so, that in the discussions that are to take place in cabinet, and in caucus, everything will be on the table. I take it that he means all the policies of the government will be on the table. If that is the case, are the budgetary policies brought in last November to be on the table, and if so, is Parliament, including the committees of this chamber, not wasting its time by solemnly considering some of the tax bills that arise from the November budget? Will the government not agree to put all of this on hold until we have the promised up-date from the Minister of Finance?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as I said yesterday, I am not now going to try to usurp the functions of the house leader in the other place. My honourable friend is asking if we will give a commitment to put everything on hold until an up-date on economic policies comes up. I do not have the authority to do that, and I would not expect the house leader in the other place to cease all consideration of the matters that are before that house, pending the up-date.

The other part of Senator Murray's question is, is everything going to be on the table? Senator Murray must realize that he is asking me to divulge to him in advance what the agenda of the meetings of both caucus and cabinet are going to be. He knows better than to expect an answer to that.

THE CABINET

HONOURABLE JACK AUSTIN—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin. I apologize for not giving him his ministerial title, but it is from that that the question really arises. Perhaps the minister will tell us exactly what his ministerial responsibilities are. The CDC seems to have diminished in scope. I wonder if the minister could tell us exactly what his terms of reference are and what his responsibilities are in Cabinet. I look forward to asking him questions from time to time. I do not want to leave him out. I have so much respect for him, from my trips to Ottawa when he was a deputy minister and I was the supplicant for a province. I would very much like him to tell us exactly what it is that he does so that I can honour him with questions from time to time.

• (1425)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I am extremely grateful to the honourable senator for his inquiry. There are a number of things I do—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): And do very well.

Senator Austin: Some of them include responsibility for the federal presence of Expo '86 to be held in Vancouver from May to October, 1986. As honourable senators know, that year is the one hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the City of Vancouver. We intend to hold an exposition there on the subject of transportation. I know that all honourable senators will want to attend what will be a magnificent demonstration of Canadian technology in the form of the transportation mode, and also of foreign technology. The federal government is building a host pavilion. The announcement was made on April 1 by Senator Olson, Senator Perrault and myself, and also by Premier Bennett and some other provincial ministers, that we will build a Canadian host pavilion which will be turned into a trade and convention centre in the City of Vancouver. That is a project having considerable support in my city, and it is occupying a good deal of my attention.

The subject of the Canada Development Corporation will continue to be an important part of my responsibility. The federal government remains an equity holder of approximately half of the shares of that company, and a continuation of the wellbeing of our investment, and, of course, of its marketing over time is a matter that I expect will engage me.

The Prime Minister has also assigned to me responsibility for advice in terms of the constitutional evolution of the Governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. I have been engaged in assisting the Honourable John Munro in that respect—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Did you have anything to do with the election?

Senator Austin: —as well as for the economic development of those two territories. I have also been assigned a participatory role in the First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal Rights. I am assisting Mr. Munro and other ministers in that particular field.

In a general way, I share with my colleague, Senator Perrault, regional responsibility for the province of British Columbia, with my assignments essentially being to assist Senator Olson in his responsibilities, and also the Honourable Herb Gray in his responsibilities for the economic development package in the province of British Columbia.

Those are some of the things that I am doing. I sit on the Economic Development Committee and the Social Policy Committee of Cabinet, as well as on Treasury Board.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his explanation and his long litany of responsibilities. I still do not know what his title is. Is it "Minister of State responsible for the Big Carnival on the West Coast," or "for Ongoing Constitutional Matters which may from time to time disrupt the affairs of the nation"; or are we to say that the minister is responsible for the state of the political situation in the Yukon and other developing parts of Canada; or is he just "Minister of State"?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, my title is "Minister of State." It is not capable of a short additional summary, but I am pleased to share with the honourable senator information on the role that I play. I take collective responsibility, with other members of the Cabinet, in terms of the events that take place in these particular areas and in matters of government policy generally.

I wish to say to Senator Doody that I hope to further the federal government's interest in those areas in a co-operative and collegial way with the territorial governments and with the provincial governments with which I interface. I have had very good relations with the present Leader of the Government in the Yukon, Mr. Pearson. We have had quite a number of discussions about the constitutional evolution of government in that territory.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: Do you claim responsibility for the fact that no Liberal was elected in the recent Yukon election?

Senator Austin: That is a political question. I do not take credit, liability or responsibility for those things that are particularly political.

Senator Flynn: I will grant you credit.

Senator Austin: I say to Senator Flynn that I will work very hard for the increase of the credibility of my government in the Yukon Territories.

Senator Flynn: You will have to.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his answer, and I shall now attempt to find some areas that I can research and ask him questions on. The fact that the minister is going to attempt to establish some credibility for his government in the west, certainly gives him lots of room and lots of scope, and starting from ground zero, there is no where to go but up.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister of state responsible for the economy in Canada can tell me whether or not he is prepared to table the report that the consultants who advised the Government of Canada on the price to pay for the Petrofina stock submitted some months ago. At the time I asked the minister to provide us with that information there were many people in Canada who felt, and I think justifiably so, an outrageous price was paid by the taxpayers of Canada for that stock. The price was way in excess of its valuation on the market and in the commercial world of Canada. The only justification given at that time was that that price was paid on the advice of a reputable group of consultants—and I have no doubt that they are reputable. I wonder if the minister is prepared to table that document so that we may share his knowledge in that area?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if that study is to be made available, I will try to obtain a copy for my honourable friend and, if not, I will provide him with the answer.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT AID—GUIDELINES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wonder if the deputy government leader would accept a question on behalf of the government leader. The answer is one that will have to be deferred. In June 1981, I asked the Leader of the Government if he could outline for us the policy of the government in terms of aid to industries that are in difficulties. At that time the Leader of the Government said that he would be pleased to do so. He also said that the minister's office would be contacted, and that he hoped that a clarifying statement could be made in the chamber.

Up to this point in time, there is still no definite policy of which I am aware, and there are more and more companies in Canada getting into greater and greater difficulties. There are still no guidelines which we can apply, or to which we can refer the business people of this country in the event that they are in difficulty. I wonder if the honourable senator would undertake to get that information for me.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, I do not accept that there are no policies, but I understand that the questioner wants specific information about those programs. I shall certainly put out a tracer to find the information as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, excluding the legislation which may flow from the presentation of a new budget or budget measures—and I say that because there are rumours of declarations that have been initiated by the Prime Minister—would the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us what legislation we can expect to receive before the summer adjournment and possibly the practical end of the session with a new session beginning some time in the fall?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am advised that there is a real possibility that the energy package—that is, the package of individual energy bills—will be passed in the other place as early as the end of this week. That is well in advance of the outer limit placed by the House Order and the agreement reached between the parties in the other place. So we can expect to receive a good deal of that legislation next week. There will, of course, be supply bills, but according to the information I have, I do not expect them much before the third week in June.

Senator Flynn: In two weeks' time?

Senator Frith: I expect that next week they may very well be adopted in the other place, so we should receive that legislation in the following week.

I believe that the bill on Enerco, C-116, which is, in a sense, part of the energy package but not a part of the eight bills, will be dealt with by the House of Commons perhaps as early as Friday of this week. Then there is talk, as there always seems to be at this time of year, about the Canada Day legislation. If the schedule I just mentioned is achieved, then such bills as those dealing with Canagrex and so on may come to us.

The only legislation that I feel quite sure about is the energy bills and the borrowing bill and, perhaps, the Canada Day Bill. There could be more if the legislation I referred to receives speedy passage in the other place.

Senator Flynn: What about the freedom of information legislation?

Senator Frith: I only know what I hear on the radio and read in the newspapers about that. From what I read and hear from those two sources, that legislation may come over as well. I will inquire about it.

Senator Flynn: And what about the sex offences amendments to the Criminal Code?

Senator Frith: I have no information on that legislation, but I shall add it to my list of inquiries.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I was unfortunately detained, and thus am late in arriving, but I am advised that we are still in Question Period. I do not have a question, but I want to remind those senators opposite, particularly those who are responsible, that the law says a senator must retire when he reaches the age of 75. I have addressed some questions to ministers opposite, and have not yet received replies. In the hope that the replies will be forthcoming before old age catches up with me, I would renew them today and draw them to the attention of the deputy leader, at least, and ask if he would have them answered.

On January 27, 1981 I addressed a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate dealing with the procedure of payment and collection of student loans in Nova Scotia. As it is reported at page 1574 of Hansard, his response was:

Honourable senators, information will be sought on that point and brought to the Senate as soon as it is available.

That information does not appear to be available, and I am trusting that the date of availability may be advanced so that it may beat my removal from the Senate.

The second question is one I asked on April 14, 1981, and it was addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. This exchange can be found at page 2283 of Hansard. I asked the minister whether he accepted the view of the Canadian Energy Users Council that energy prices should rapidly and substantially decline. The minister gave as his reply that he would try to find some confirmation on that. I ask this afternoon if his efforts have been rewarded or unrewarded, because I have no information as to what luck he has had.

My third question was asked on May 21, and again addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In substance the question was: Is the government prepared to reconsider its decision to refuse an exemption to Canadian shipowners with respect to the surcharge levied on marine diesel oil. As reported at page 2431 of Hansard, the minister's answer was:

—I cannot answer that question directly, but I will refer the matter to the proper authorities.

If he knows who those authorities are and if he can, in fact, direct the question to them, I will ask him to be good enough to see if an answer can be given at a reasonably early date.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to be the first to join with the deputy leader in acknowledging that questions that seek information ought to be answered, and that the shorter the time lag the better.

● (1440)

I think we are trying to do that, but I am afraid I have to object a little to the criticism contained in Senator Donahoe's questions. He asks whether he is going to get an answer to some kind of perception by a council. I am not sure what he means by all of that, but in any event I really do not regard that as having a high priority. I do not think we are going to read somebody else's report and give an opinion on it.

If there are other questions that the honourable gentlemen opposite have in which they think they are entitled to some factual background information that they have been seeking, I should like them identified, but there are two or three categories. The ones that Senator Donahoe just outlined do not impress me.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Perhaps the minister will be more impressed with his own undertakings given in the Senate to me on a number of occasions, which I shall now cite.

On November 17, 1981, at page 3007 of Hansard, under the general heading of "Economic Development—Reduction in Expenditures," the minister replied to a question of mine as follows:

I will bring you a statement.

At page 3008 the minister stated:

Honourable senators, I think I had better bring in a complete compilation of what was put in the budget last year, what was in fact spent, and what is projected for the fiscal year 1982-83. I think it would be helpful, because it would completely devastate the validity of the calculations made by the Honourable Senator Murray.

Well, honourable senators, I am still waiting to be devastated by these facts. I have not seen them yet.

Senator Olson: I probably did bring in a statement.

Senator Murray: The minister probably did not bring in a statement, because if he had, I would have a record of it.

Again, on February 3, 1982, at page 3547 of Hansard, the minister undertook to obtain information for me on the so-called negative spread, the difference between the cost of money to the Export Development Corporation and the rates at which the Export Development Corporation lends moneys. The minister replied:

I will take all of these factors into consideration and try to provide an answer—

On March 2, 1982, at page 3725 of Hansard, when I reminded the minister of his previous undertaking concerning the Export Development Corporation, I stated:

The second matter concerns the respective roles and responsibilities of the representatives of the Minister of State for Economic Development in the provinces, and those of the agents of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office in those provinces.

The Minister of State for Economic Development replied:

I will take note of my honourable friend's expectations.

On March 25, 1982, at page 3878 of Hansard the minister stated:

I do not believe I ought to try to give reasons for the action of the Bank of Canada without first making some inquiries.

Further down the same page the minister stated:

I will obtain an opinion from those involved in that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): An opinion?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Flynn: He refuses to give opinions.

Senator Olson: All these questions ask for expectations, opinions, and so forth.

Senator Murray: The minister undertook to obtain—

Senator Olson: I was asked a question requesting information. I am not any more impressed with the second request than I was with Senator Donahoe's.

Senator Murray: It is a matter of the greatest indifference to me whether the minister is impressed or unimpressed. When a question is asked of the minister and the minister undertakes to provide information, I think he should do so within a reasonable period of time.

On May 26, 1982, at page 4192 of Hansard I asked a question concerning the Ontario Provincial Treasurer's budget—I was talking about Mr. Miller's budget—and income tax incentives for people to buy common stock. I asked the minister whether the federal government would consider entering into a program with the Government of Ontario on that matter, and the minister stated:

I will make inquiries to find out whether such an initiative has been taken.

I simply place those requests on the record in the hope and expectation that the minister will obtain the information which he undertook to obtain, and bring it to the Senate.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—SUBSIDIZATION OF FISHING INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for economic and regional development, I think it is. I wonder whether the minister could undertake to bring to this house a statement on the policy relating to the subsidization of the fishing industry and fish plants in the province of Newfoundland.

Recently a plant located in the community of St. Anthony, which employs approximately 800 people, was reactivated—to the joy of the people of that community—by the Government of Canada through a wholly-owned crown corporation, a subsidiary of a group for whom I think Michael Kirby is responsible, but that is of no significance.

There are many other plants in difficulty in the province of Newfoundland, so I wonder if the minister could tell us if this is a policy of general application, or whether it is just an isolated case in what is certainly an isolated area—and most of them are located in isolated areas.

This is a matter of grave concern to a great many people in Newfoundland, because of the obvious economic impact on the communities and the social implications, as well as the general direction of the fishing industry itself in the province of Newfoundland.

In the eyes of the Government of Canada, will this, in the future, become a crown corporation type of operation?

I know that that industry is experiencing a tremendous number of difficulties. I also know that private industry has had a hard time trying to operate those plants, so I wonder if the minister could clarify this for the benefit of myself and the many other people interested in these types of operations.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, an announcement was made, I believe on May 27, by the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that the federal government was taking more positive action with respect to the plant located at St. Anthony, but I do not have any notes on that statement before me.

My honourable friend knows far better than I that there were special considerations with respect to that particular plant located at St. Anthony. I say that because my honourable friend knows that it is the only plant located in an area surrounded by large fishing grounds.

I do not think that I can give my honourable friend a commitment now that I will bring a report or initiate a study with respect to the subsidization of the fishing industry. A task force has already been appointed to look into that matter, so I think we should await the report, findings and recommendations of that task force.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his answer, but in giving me his answer he really anticipated part of the problem.

The plant in question is indeed in the riding of the Minister of National Revenue, and while one must congratulate him for his concern for his constituents, and be grateful for that help, nevertheless there are, as I say, many other plants located in many other parts of the province which are in grave difficulty, and some are located near St. Anthony.

I ask why the rest of the province should have to wait for the results of the task force headed by Mr. Kirby while that particular plant, which is in the Minister of National Revenue's riding, gets immediate assistance. This is one of the concerns really being raised in the province of Newfoundland.

I appreciate the fact that people should wait until the task force has reported, but I also appreciate that people are in need of immediate help. If the minister can reconcile the two for me and the other people interested in this, I would be in his debt.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure that it is possible to reconcile that for my honourable friend's biased analysis, so I will not even attempt to do so, but I can say that the people connected with the plant located at St. Anthony are good fishermen, good Canadians and good Newfoundlanders, and they would be in great difficulty had the plant not been re-opened. There are probably 1,100 or 1,200 fishermen who would have had no alternative but to sell their catch at other plants, and there are great distances involved.

I am not here to make an argument that there is no other single fishermen who may be in similar difficulty in other locations in Newfoundland, but I understand that generally speaking, at least, even though all the plants are not re-opening, there is no other geographical area in the kind of difficulty that can be ascribed to St. Anthony.

Senator Doody: Once again, and with respect, I have to correct the minister. He is absolutely right in his description of the people who live in the St. Anthony area. They are, indeed, very capable people, expert fishermen, with a great deal of tradition and background in the fishing industry, and they certainly deserve all the help and assistance they can get. The same description applies with extreme accuracy to fishermen and fisherwomen living throughout the province of Newfoundland.

• (1450)

St. Anthony is not in the isolated condition, in terms of the rest of the province, that it was a few years ago. There is an excellent paved road that runs all the way to the plant, up to the northern peninsula and so on. As a matter of fact, it has an advantage over many of the communities on the coast of Labrador and on the south coast of the island which have no road connections at all and are completely dependent on that one plant. That is not to minimize the problem of the people of St. Anthony because when a plant closes the economy collapses. It simply serves to demonstrate that that is exactly the same thing as is happening in many other communities in Newfoundland which are just as isolated as the St. Anthony plant, but perhaps they do not have the same sort of advocate working for them in the Government of Canada. That is why I asked the minister to clarify the policy so that the people in other parts of the province can take advantage of the generosity and largesse of the Government of Canada in terms of their survival during the coming year.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did not intend to widen the discussion—

Senator Doody: But you did.

Senator Olson: —to all of these things, but I did. I thought a few moments ago we were talking about accessibility for the purposes of marketing fish. If my honourable friend, who knows the island and the coastline around it far better than I do, claims that there are other fishing areas where the same distances are involved to get to a plant that could buy their fish, perhaps that is so. On the basis of my limited knowledge, I am led to believe that there were special circumstances surrounding St. Anthony.

Senator Doody: I should like to have left this particular subject after the first question, because I simply asked the minister to bring in a policy direction for the rest of the province, but he insisted on telling me about the special circumstances in St. Anthony and, with great respect, as I said to my colleague, Senator Marshall, both of us know a great deal more about the area than the honourable minister. What the minister does have at his disposal, however, is the inside knowledge of the policy direction of the Government of Canada in terms of the fishing industry in Newfoundland. I simply ask him to bring forward a statement so that the rest of the people in the province will know exactly what they are doing. St. Anthony is looked after for at least a year. What is going to happen to the rest of the province?

Senator Olson: I understand that there has been a great deal of comment with respect to the St. Anthony situation, and that it is not only a matter of the people living in and adjacent to the St. Anthony fishing plant. There is also widespread support for seeing that that plant gets opened, for the reasons I explained a few moments ago.

Senator Doody: So, the minister will bring in a policy statement for us.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. As the minister no doubt knows, housing starts in May, on a seasonally-adjusted basis, were 116,000 units. This is the lowest rate since last October. That works out to actual starts in urban areas being down 51 per cent, and single detached dwelling units being down 63 per cent. I might point out that in 1976, which is six years ago, 400,000 more people were employed in residential construction than there are today. I have asked the minister about this problem before and he answered, quite correctly, that Bill C-89 would probably generate 30,000 starts, or is supposed to generate 30,000 starts, but this seems like very little.

My question is: Does the government have any plans to promote even more the housing industry, which is a great engine for the development of this country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if there are to be further announcements, the minister directly responsible will make them. I think that my honourable friend wants to be fair, and it is entirely possible that the number of initiatives that have already been announced by the minister responsible have not become fully effective and, therefore, are not in place. It may be that additional units will reach the "start" position as a result of the initiatives that have been announced.

Having said that, it is regrettable that the downturn in the economy and, therefore, the demand for new housing, has been such that it has left some slack in the number of people who are involved in that sector. We acknowledge that, but we also realize that the level of housing starts has to be related to the number of sales made.

ORAL QUESTIONS

JUDGMENT AS TO VALIDITY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question I have been yearning to ask ever since the minister made his comments on my questions to which I sought answers which had been too long delayed.

My question is: Does the Minister of State for Economic Development intend to continue to be the sole judge as to whether questions emanating from this side of the house are too frivolous to deserve an answer or are, in fact, meant in a serious manner?

Further, if he does so consider that he is to remain such a judge, does he intend to answer the frivolous questions with an undertaking to seek further answers, which he has no intention whatever of complying with?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the simple answer to all of that is "no."

Hon. David Walker: The minister was coached.

Senator Donahoe: I can appreciate and understand that kind of answer.

NOVA SCOTIA

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—INELIGIBILITY OF LAID-OFF EMPLOYEES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS—QUALITY OF PRODUCT—ALLEGED COMMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to several questions posed by Senator Muir. I am giving the response now so that when he reads this he can write "Answered" alongside a great number of them. The questions related to the Sydney Steel Corporation in Nova Scotia.

On the question of whether workers laid off at Sysco qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, I am pleased to confirm that they do qualify. They will receive their benefits in accordance with the applicable regulations and without delays.

On the issue of the quality of the rail produced by Sysco, the Minister of Transport did indeed make reference to problems encountered by Canadian National in this respect. There have been discussions between CN and Sysco to ascertain if the company is able to produce the type of rail CN needs. I understand the two companies have concluded that an independent assessor should be appointed to resolve the uncertainties regarding quality.

I would draw honourable senators' attention to the answer provided in the house by the Minister of Transport on June 7, which states:

First, with regard to honouring the contract, the contract is indeed at the 88,000 ton level for 1982-83. CN would like to reduce that because it will have to store light rail. However, a contract is a contract. Having made the commitment, I am willing to press CN to honour it.

With regard to the advance production, the possibility is there. It is estimated that it would cost $1.4 million more to begin producing sooner, instead of in August. The Minister of Finance is willing to pay one half of that if the government of Nova Scotia or Sysco is willing to pay the other half.

I should like to repeat that that was a reply to a long list of questions that were asked.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I apologize profusely for not arriving in the chamber to hear all of the answers, but part of the latter answer contained the words "a contract is a contract is a contract." I believe the minister said that if the provincial government would pay a portion of the cost, the federal government would pay a portion in order to proceed with the contract for the rails. Am I correct in that assumption?

Senator Olson: My understanding is that the contract calls for some of this that would otherwise have to be taken in advance to begin production in August.

Senator Muir: May I ask the honourable gentleman if, during the period that uranium was stockpiled and during the period that coal was stockpiled over the years, the provincial government of that day—whatever government was involved—had to pay part of the costs of stockpiling?

● (1500)

Senator Olson: I understand my honourable friend's question, in that there is a relationship between the two, but I think he has to understand that in many respects we are dealing here with a provincial crown corporation.

Senator Muir: I thank my honourable friend. I look forward to reading his response in Hansard tomorrow, and then, perhaps, we can proceed further.

QUEBEC

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF CERTAIN PROVINCIAL STATUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on May 20 as to whether the government intended or intends to refer the question of the validity of Quebec Bill 62, the Charter of Rights override, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Honourable senators, at this moment, the federal government has no intention of referring the question of the constitutional validity of Quebec Bill 62 to the Supreme Court of Canada for determination.

Quebec Bill 62 exempts every law of that province from the constitutional protections of fundamental freedoms, legal and equality rights provided in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Contrary to Senator Asselin's assertion, the Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, and the Minister of State, Mr. Joyal, never stated that they would ask for a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada on the constitutionality of Bill 62. Mr. Joyal stated only that a reference was one of the options available to the federal government.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Nurgitz on May 5 concerning the billboard advertising campaign of the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Senator Nurgitz's first question was: What specific program was this in aid of?

Honourable senators, the billboards were used across Canada as a support medium and image transfer vehicle from the more detailed messages appearing on television and in print. Image transfer—in this case, the illustration and the theme—is recommended advertising industry practice. As such, the billboards were part of the overall multi-media mix prescribed by the English agency. The advertising campaign was designed to promote the training opportunities offered by CEIC and to advertise the new national training program.

Senator Nurgitz's second question was: How does an unemployed person, with those words in his head, obtain a job or obtain re-training so that he can be qualified for another job?

Honourable senators, the new national training program will provide training and re-training opportunities for Canadians. These opportunities will be in the skill areas where workers will be required in the eighties. CEIC's training budget has risen from $836,000 for 1981-82 to more than $1 billion for 1982-83. A new occupational projection system is being put in place to help Canadians gain employment.

In response to Senator Nurgitz's third question, as to what "this Madison Avenue wording does for unemployed persons," it is my information that the campaign theme "Helping Canada Work" was researched by Goldfarb Consultants. Those interviewed felt the message of the campaign was "an important and timely message in people's minds with the current high level of unemployment." Even in difficult times, it is important to recognize the necessity for training for the jobs that will need to be filled in the future.

PUBLIC WORKS

NOVA SCOTIA—NORTH SYDNEY—DILAPIDATED STATE OF FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, since the Deputy Leader of the Government is talking about high unemployment, I would pose a further question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Talking about what?

Senator Muir: High unemployment and employment. I would appreciate it if he would take notice of this question which, to some of you, may seem to be a trivial matter. The federal building in the town of North Sydney, Nova Scotia is leaking badly and is falling apart because no repairs or renovations have been done on it since it was built during the Diefenbaker regime.

Would the honourable gentleman look into this matter to ascertain whether something can be done to repair and renovate the building so that it will look a little better than a slipshod mess? A project of this type would provide some employment.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, someone more partisan than I might be tempted to make a comment about this government's skill in fixing up the deficiencies of the Diefenbaker regime. Of course, not being partisan, I would not make such a comment.

I will certainly pass this specific question along to the Department of Public Works and try to obtain some information in answer to the question asked.

Senator Muir: As a supplementary question, I would point out that the building was constructed in 1958 to replace a building which had existed for more than 50 years until it was torn down by the Liberal administration.

I would ask my honourable friend if he is in as good shape now as he was in 1958. His response, of course, will apply to the state of this building.

Senator Frith: My response would depend on the criteria. I certainly feel in as good shape as I was in 1958.

Senator Muir: My honourable friend looks pretty good too.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the second reading of Bill C-102, to amend the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks on this bill by stating that I am requested to address myself to the questions raised by the bill, and I hasten to assure all of you that the mere fact that I do so indicates that I am willing to co-operate; it does not, in any sense, indicate that I hold myself out as a financial or economic expert.

On the other hand, I was in the chamber last night when its second reading was moved by Senator Godfrey, and while I regret that I have not had the opportunity, for other reasons, fully to peruse everything he said on that occasion, I listened to him with great interest and I made certain notes on his statements to which I will refer in my speech this afternoon.

I should like to begin by displaying to my colleagues this red book. I do not know how many of you have been in receipt of a similar volume. It is entitled: "The Energy Security Bills C-101 to C-108. House of Commons. Speeches by the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister, Energy, Mines and Resources."

Insofar as I found them applicable to my immediate task, I perused the speeches. I certainly read the one that the minister gave in moving second reading of Bill C-106 in the other place. I will not bore my friends, who may have read it for themselves, by repeating it in full, but there is one paragraph—and I hope I will not be accused of taking what he said out of context—that appeals to me immeasurably. It states:

The legislation follows a commitment made by the leader of our party, the current Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—

I suppose that is just in case anybody did not know who the current Prime Minister is, but I suggest we all have plenty of cause to know.

The paragraph goes on to state:

—in a speech in Halifax—

This caught my eye because Halifax is mentioned in the paragraph, and that is where I live. To conclude:

—during the last election campaign.

[Senator Muir.]

Honourable senators, these are not my words; these are the words of Mr. Lalonde. He said:

It was during that speech—

That is, the speech of the Prime Minister.

—that he unveiled the National Energy Program, including the promise of a petroleum pricing and auditing agency. The agency was to keep a watch on industry costs, profits and operations. We followed that by referring to the agency again in the last Speech from the Throne—

"Last" is a good description of something that came so long ago. It is more than two years since we had that speech; it is about time we had a new one. Every effort we make to find out when we may expect one is turned aside, and we get meaningless answers.

At any rate, Mr. Lalonde continued:

—as a device not only to monitor industry revenues and expenditures but the levels of Canadian ownership as well.

Now, honourable senators, you may say, "What is there in that speech that would cause Senator Donahoe to read it?" You will tell me, "It sounds all right to me." I cannot disagree with anything that is in it, and I am sure that Senator Godfrey does not, but it is not what is contained in the speech that I disagree with; it is what is not contained in the speech. We are always accused of taking things out of context, but there my honourable friend is quoting from a speech made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign in Halifax, in which he said all of the wonderful things which were to follow as a result of the National Energy Program. The honourable senator fails to repeat, however, that in that same speech, the Prime Minister of Canada gave his unequivocal word that the price of gasoline at the pumps would be less than the 18-cent increase the Conservatives had promised. The people of Nova Scotia are uninformed; they are gullible sometimes, and they believed him. He got substantial representation in the House of Commons, made up of members who were elected on the sole promise that they would act, when in Parliament, to see that the price of energy—the price of gasoline at the pumps—was less than that which the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, had promised it would be and which Mr. Trudeau himself had told them they might well expect.

• (1510)

I will not go into details about the price of gas. I will not make comparisons between what we pay at the pumps in Halifax and what we pay at the pumps in Ottawa. Nor will I mention what the Americans pay, or the cause of any such difference. However, we might readily have believed that Mr. Clark was an optimist. We might readily have believed that the offshore price of oil would increase to an extent such that he would find it difficult to hold himself to his promise of 18 cents. He did hold himself to his promise of 18 cents and was never called upon to put it to the test, because everybody on the other side of the house and all those members of the public who listened to Mr. Trudeau said, "We won't give you the chance. We won't wait to find out whether you can make 18 cents stick. We will listen to Mr. Trudeau, who says that whatever his price will be, it will be less than 18 cents."

Honourable senators, I will not go to great lengths. I simply ask everyone who is listening to my voice to honestly ask themselves the question: Did Mr. Trudeau keep his promise, or was it a pure figment of his imagination?

Hon. C. William Doody: It was an election ploy.

Senator Donahoe: I listened carefully to Senator Godfrey. As I said, I have not yet had a chance to read yesterday's Hansard.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: It is not out yet.

Senator Donahoe: I did, however, copy down what he said, and I hope it is accurate. He said that the act will give the government, under the control of Parliament, the power to form new crown corporations. The honourable senator is listening to me. If I am misquoting him or if I have not repeated what he said accurately, I stand to be corrected right here and now. I do not hear anything from the honourable senator.

Senator Godfrey: That is exactly what I said.

Senator Donahoe: I congratulate the honourable senator upon his willingness to take the responsibility for what he said, because he said that the creation of the crown corporations would be under the control of Parliament. If that means that Parliament has some say about whether or not there should be a crown corporation, and if that is what he means to say, then he does not fully understand, in my opinion, the true meaning of the English language.

While it is true that everything is under the control of Parliament, in the sense that everything flows from acts passed by Parliament, Bill C-102, which we are discussing, will provide the machinery by which crown corporations may be established. If that is so, and if you are Senator Godfrey, it is possible to say that they are established under the control of Parliament.

Senator Doody: Hold your nose!

Senator Donahoe: In my opinion, honourable senators, that is far from being the truth. The act really provides the machinery by which crown corporations may be established, not by Parliament—not by the House of Commons or the Senate—but by order in council.

I am only a greenhorn in this matter, but I was taught that orders in council are actions of the executive branch of the government; that the executive is a branch of the government separate from Parliament—the House of Commons and the Senate—which constitutes the legislative branch of the government. Therefore, the executive branch is to be empowered, under this act, to create crown corporations.

Senator Godfrey: That is exactly what I said.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, to reiterate, the honourable senator said that crown corporations would be established under the control of Parliament, in the sense that the act gives the authority to constitute crown corporations. However, I know, and the honourable senator knows, if he would only admit it, that once the act is passed, the authority rests not in Parliament—not in the House of Commons, nor in the Senate—but in the order in council. I may come back to this in another context, but do not think it makes much difference that the authority is given by order in council.

I have heard it advanced as an argument by the supporters of the bill that we need not be afraid of this, because, after all, the authority granted to create crown corporations is not vested in a single minister: it is vested subject to being approved by order in council; therefore, all of the ministers will be consulted. Nowhere did I hear an argument that a legislative branch of the government was to have any further or any direct say in whether or not a crown corporation is to be created. That was the first thing that Senator Godfrey had to say.

Senator Godfrey: You obviously were not listening to my speech.

Senator Donahoe: It is perfectly obvious that I was listening to the honourable senator's speech because I quoted from it, and he admitted that I quoted from it exactly. I then gave honourable senators my understanding, as an ordinary boy from the country, so to speak, of what he said. Apparently, it was entirely different from what these great money collectors from Upper Canada conceive the words to mean; they mean, to him, something different from what they mean to me.

I am of the opinion that this bill is an abdication by Parliament of its authority to create crown corporations. From now on, the order in council—the executive branch of the government, or Mr. Trudeau, if you like—will be able to say, "This will be a crown corporation. We do not have to ask anybody's permission; we only have to put it in an order in council." If those who sign the orders in council are as ready to give their consent to what Mr. Trudeau wants on this occasion as they are on most occasions, then it is a pure formality to say that an order in council is required.

I return to what the honourable senator had to say. He said the power of the minister needs approval by order in council; in other words, the executive must approve and "to hell with the House of Commons, to hell with the Senate. We do not need anything from them. From now on, boys, once that bill is passed, we are home free. We will pass that bill and we will create as many crown corporations as we want."

The honourable senator then said that we are always to bear in mind that, if we read the bill carefully, we will find that the authority vested in the executive branch—in the orders in council—only applies to the field of energy. All I can say in reply is that if it is wrong in every other field, it is wrong in the field of energy as well. The principle under which crown corporations can be created by a mere order in council is certainly a poor principle and is one that ought not to be approved by affirmative vote of this house.

The honourable senator then went on to speak about the negative resolution which is required by Parliament. I admit now that I am on dangerous ground.

Senator Doody: Oh, oh!

Senator Donahoe: In case anyone may have forgotten, Parliament consists of two houses: it consists of the Senate and of the House of Commons. It must be as clear as daylight—it is to me, though perhaps I see things that others cannot see—that if a negative motion is required from both houses, and if one house passes an affirmative motion while the other passes a negative motion, the condition established has not been met: there has not been a negative motion; both houses have not said, “No, we will not have a crown corporation.” Therefore, if the House of Commons were to vote negatively and say, “No, we will not have a crown corporation,” and the question was then put to the Senate as to whether or not we should have a crown corporation, and we said, “Yes, we will”—in other words, if we voted affirmatively—then it would be perfectly clear that the condition had not been met; one of the two houses would have failed to give a negative vote on the matter, we would have a negative and a positive vote, not two negative votes, and would therefore not have fulfilled the condition of the act, so that what had been decided in the other place would follow. In other words, a bill is approved by virtue of a vote taken in the Senate.

● (1520)

This bill is a bill to create crown corporations. The thing which disturbs me most about the fact that crown corporations can be created by the executive, without reference to the legislature, is the fact that such crown corporations may, in some cases, be either agents or agencies of the federal government. If they turn out to be agents of the federal government, they are in the position of having the authority to borrow money and to impose obligations on the taxpayers of Canada. In other words, without any reference whatever to Parliament, without any reference either to the elected representatives or even to the appointed representatives of the people, or their opinion being asked for in any way, we find that new obligations are imposed upon the taxpayers of Canada by an arbitrary action of the government of this country.

There is one bright spot with regard to this bill. It is not in exactly the same shape as it was in when it was presented. I do not intend to go into the question, as my honourable friend did, of the 15 votes in the Senate and the 30 votes in the House of Commons. I just remind him, however, that if he wants to read Hansard he will find that there was a very serious slip-up in this bill, and that when the bill was presented in the first instance to the House of Commons it did not say 30 and 15, or 20 and 40; it said 50 and 30. That is the bill they put forward. The minister had to say, abjectly, “I do not understand it. There must have been an error. I will gladly withdraw the bill and substitute a new one.”

When I read about this, I thought, “Thirty votes in the Senate? The official opposition in the Senate has 27 votes.” Well, then I said to myself that if only the opposition wished to have the matter thought about, or rejected, they would be unable to present such a petition because at the moment our membership does not equal the number originally provided for in the bill. It is true that today it reads 15, and not 30, and that we could conceivably present the appropriate petition and have our views considered; but it would appear that was an afterthought on the part of the minister.

That reminds me. I am talking about what the minister had to say, and though I know you cannot rely on what you read in the newspapers, and that some commentators are biased, here are some remarks by a columnist who was at one time a member of the House of Commons. His name is Fisher. I know from my experience in public life that if you assume that the headline to an article was put there by the author, you are likely to be told that it was not the author who put it there but somebody else in the employ of the newspaper. I therefore do not place the responsibility for the title on the shoulders of the author. Somebody, however,—and I do not know who it was, perhaps someone unknown to any of us—entitled this article, “Shoddy Speech.” Who made the shoddy speech? Was it Senator Donahoe, or Senator Flynn, or anybody on this side of the house? Was it a member of the official opposition in the other place? It was not. It was Marc Lalonde, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He devoted a very substantial portion of what he had to say to what this article describes as a mean and nasty diatribe directed in personal ways at people who are opposed to his views. I do not intend to quote the speech, but there is comment on the situation to which the minister was referring in this column by Mr. Fisher. Since it is relevant, and since it is relatively brief, I am going to read it to you.

All around the federal scene the purposes and plans have gone awry. The budget is in worse disarray than living memory can recall. Mega-projects have been blown away by the winds of recession. Federal-provincial relations are abysmal, rife with distrust. Unemployment is staggering. Inflation hangs on with few signs of flagging. The leadership question of the Liberals seems insoluble in the short run. Trudeau must stay, if only as a lightning rod for massive discontent.

If Lalonde has been responsible for much of the thrust, then one may read his inept drivel as evidence the toughest man on the team is cracking.

That is a series of comments made on the situation in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources introduced this bill. It may or may not be strictly relevant, but it seemed to me that it was material that might well be taken into consideration by an objective person who is endeavouring to decide what his stand on the bill should be.

I began my speech by saying that I do not purport to be an economist or any other kind of expert on this matter, but there are people who understand the bill far better than I, and some of them are those members who were present when the bill was considered in committee in the other place, and although I am not going to quote everything that was said on that occasion, there are a few questions and answers that I think are worth repeating in that they give food for thought to those who have to decide what to do about this bill in this chamber.

The first question was asked of no less a person than the Auditor General of Canada. It is important to remember that never before in the history of the office of Auditor General has the person occupying that position been called to come before a committee to give evidence unless that committee was dealing directly with matters concerning his department. In this case, however, the committee was dealing with energy, and the Auditor General was called. He was asked about the accountability of crown corporations. He was told that certain corporations may be established under this bill. I read in the report of the committee that he acknowledged that the bill did not require that new crown corporations that are being created be scheduled under the Financial Administration Act, and hence be made subject to certain accounting and accountability requirements. He also acknowledged that no requirement existed that the mandate of a new crown corporation be spelled out to Parliament in advance of its being set up. There is one of the most responsible officials of the federal government expressing his view on the responsibility of the executive. He has made it perfectly clear that there is no requirement for the matter to be referred to the legislative branch. In his opinion, it is solely and unquestionably a matter for the determination and establishment of the executive.

• (1530)

It was noted that the broad powers granted under the bill to the minister are not restrictive since the corporation established under the Canada Business Corporations Act has the powers of an individual and would not be limited to the energy field, but in fact could range into positions beyond energy.

I draw that question to Senator Godfrey's attention, because it seems to cast considerable doubt upon a contention that he was making when he spoke, in which he said that the authority given by this act was solely and purely restricted to the field of energy. It may be, and is intended to be, but it is very questionable as to whether or not it is so restricted. This would apply equally to subsidiaries incorporated under the CBC Act.

The answer to the question is most interesting, and I ask all honourable senators to listen to it and to think about it. The question was:

What do you see in C-102—

That is the bill we are considering:

—that meets the criterion you desire for sufficient Parliamentary direction in the incorporation of new Crown Corporations?

The Auditor General's answer was:

I do not see as much as I would like to see. If it meets the requirements of the private sector investor investing in a corporation offered publicly that is quite different from the needs of parliamentarians.

I have had to sit here and listen to the bill's being introduced, and be told that it is done under the authority and control of Parliament. I do not accept that statement, and if the honourable senator is as objective as I believe him to be, even though I know him to be partisan—despite the disavowals by some honourable senators—I feel that he can only come to the same conclusion as I have and agree with me—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe:—that, like me, he knows it is a misstatement to say that Parliament has any control over the crown corporation—certainly once it is established under the authority of this bill.

An Hon. Senator: You could vote against it.

Senator Donahoe: There was worry because if the government used the clauses creating the Canadian Ownership Fund without going through the regular estimates process it might find that that fund was a non-budgetary fund outside the estimates, and it was possible that money would be found and expended in regard to a crown corporation without its appearing in the estimates. If that is outside the estimates process, then I believe even the most partisan would admit that they are funds which can be deployed or placed into action without any reference whatsoever to Parliament.

On April 27, Mr. François Bernier, legal counsel to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments—I would ask Senator Godfrey to listen to this carefully; that is the name of a committee we hear advanced quite often in this chamber—Mr. Bernier acknowledged—and he was legal counsel, and I assume he knew what he was talking about—that there would be little parliamentary participation in such a gamut. The same gentleman was asked:

Assuming that Parliament were to be setting up a new $2 billion crown corporation, how much time would be allotted for debate in Parliament?

He did not have to hesitate about that. He knew exactly what the answer should be—

An Hon. Senator: None.

Senator Donahoe: My honourable friend says "None". The honourable senator is wrong. There was some time, but it was equivalent to nothing. On a matter that might cost taxpayers billions of dollars, the entire debate was limited to three hours. All they had were three hours, and if, when the three hours were over, there were still those who were opposed, still those who were in opposition to the bill, they would, in the customary Liberal manner, be cut off from speaking. Perhaps the Liberals did not have to invoke the closure rule; perhaps they did not have to say, "We will stop you talking somehow or other." They had it already set up. It was right there in the rules of Parliament: "Three hours and it's over, boys, and don't try to make the public understand that liabilities may be saddled on them, and that the people they elected to check those liabilities will never be informed, never be consulted. They will have shot their bolt and the deed will be done."

An Hon. Senator: "And forever hold your peace!"

Senator Donahoe: My honourable friend says "And forever hold your peace!" I wish I had thought of those words, because they are so apt.

It was noted that the bill grants parliamentary approval for the future creation of crown corporations and provides for a negative resolution. I shall not deal with that aspect concerning the negative resolution. I have indicated that the Constitution of this country says that this chamber is limited in what it may do. One thing that it may or may not do is initiate bills, the effect of which will be that public monies will be spent. They may be initiated in the other chamber and we may approve them. We may even do more than that: we may even delay them, and we may even alter them. I guess, under the new Constitution, which I am proud to say I voted against, we now have only a suspensive veto. I must admit that I was confused about the changes that were made. I know that if it is now a suspensive veto, it was not that in the beginning. In the beginning it was intended to be a true veto. It was to change the entire character; and if anyone says to me, "We have not done anything but change the veto from a true veto to a suspensive veto, and that is all we have done in the new Constitution", then all I say is: Don't get me started on that!

Senator Frith: We won't.

Senator Donahoe: I realize you won't, because you cannot bear to hear the truth. You cannot stand to realize the effects of what you have done—

Senator Frith: That is not the reason.

Senator Donahoe: —because when we tried to point out the changes to you, you were oblivious to our arguments; you went cheerfully ahead and you followed your leader, the Pied Piper—

An Hon. Senator: Of Mount Royal.

Senator Donahoe: I was going to say, "of Sussex Drive," and you voted like lambs being led to the slaughter. I am not sure whether that is a good simile, but you certainly pushed us into the ground. You made us feel that anything we said about the Constitution was said for improper reasons. You tried to make us—

Senator Frith: Now get back to Bill C-102.

Hon. G. I. Smith: When he is ready.

Senator Donahoe: I just want to say this. I know that nothing I can say, no matter how cogent, how true, how compelling, will affect the mind of the Deputy Leader of the Government. He will back the bill, and I would not mind that, because I have learned to expect that from him; but, as I look around the chamber, I do not see present all of those senators who backed the bill, but if the bill ever came to a vote they would be here, because the time we see them most is when they come in to vote us down, to register a vote, to comply with the demands of the Prime Minister that they peacefully and calmly endorse his actions.

I have almost finished on that theme, but I just want to say this one thing. When we vote in this house, some of us vote with our minds closed; others vote perhaps out of partisanship; but when anyone on this side is accused of opposing the patriation of the Constitution of this country, then I throw the lie in that person's teeth, because on this side of the house we were in favour of patriating the Constitution. There were some who voted for it, and there were some who voted against it. There were some who had one reason for so voting, and there were others who had different reasons, but, invariably and inevitably, all of us, no matter what our reasons, were in favour of patriation. There were some like me who said, "It is a gesture. We can repatriate or patriate the Constitution and the constitutional position in this country will not change one iota; it will be exactly the same, but we will have succeeded in placating those who think the Constitution should rest in Canada."

• (1540)

I see an honourable senator laughing, and he may laugh at me and think I am foolish, but I hope that I am expressing a point of view—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: That is not what I said.

Senator Donahoe: —that is shared by many people in this country, that the patriation of the Constitution was something that was desirable, not because of the effect that it would have but because of the beliefs people would have concerning the meaning of it. The people of Canada were encouraged by Mr. Trudeau to think that in patriating the Constitution they would cut off the last links of colonialism, they would be re-establishing or establishing the sovereignty of Canada.

Canada was a sovereign nation before we brought the Constitution home. In fact, it is less a sovereign nation now because by bringing it home with an entrenched Charter of Rights—and this is an argument I did not intend to make—we have deprived the elected representatives of the people of this country of the exercise of powers that had previously been given to them by the Constitution of this country. What we patriated, what we brought to this country and what the Queen signed on Parliament Hill was not the Constitution of Canada, but a constitution of Canada revised à la Trudeau and supported and approved by those who voted for it when it came before us.

I am not going to say any more about that subject because I did not intend to speak about it at all, but this is a good opportunity to put my views forward, and it is a good opportunity for the people of Canada to realize that as much as certain people might preen themselves over the benefits that accrue from what they have done, there are those in this country who think that they are far from having accomplished a very wonderful gesture; that they have, in fact, prostituted the responsibility of the Queen in this country. The Queen was brought to Canada to take part in a function and in order that the people might be attracted to that function and come in their relative hundreds to witness it.

It is true, you know, that the CBC paid the fares of a few people to come to Ottawa and that they deceived the public by having it believe in their television coverage that these people were here to express their opinions on the merits of what was being done. I do not know, but I suspect that even the speeches that those persons made when they were on national television were not their own thoughts at all, but were probably supplied to them by the people who paid their fares from their home in their respective part of the country.

I am as loyal a Canadian and as loyal to the Monarchy as any person in this house, but I still want to say that when I received an invitation two days after the event took place, and when I later received an explanation that the invitation was tendered to me so that it would serve for me as a memorial of what took place on the Hill, I breathed a sigh of relief. I said "Now, the invitation will serve no real purpose at all and I can discard it in the waste basket." That is exactly where it went. I thank those who gave me that relief and allowed me to act accordingly.

Honourable senators may have wondered, but we are talking about Bill C-102.

Senator Frith: Phew!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Donahoe: It was noted that the bill grants parliamentary approval for the future creation of crown corporations and provides for a negative resolution. I have already dealt with that, but it might be of interest to hear the comment of the Auditor General in response to the attitude that was taken. He said:

Our office would like to stand by its criteria that there should be control by Parliament over the creation of corporations.

That is an excellent criterion, one to which I subscribe, one to which the Auditor General subscribes, one to which everybody who sits in his seat on the opposite side should subscribe, and one to which even Senator Godfrey should subscribe. But then he will so misread a clause of the bill that he will decide that his needs are satisfied when, in fact, the very reverse is true. This is a long speech, and I really should bring it to an end.

Bill C-102 has a variety of aspects. In case anybody is interested, I am reading from a compilation of the clause-by-clause criticisms in the committee. I am being very careful, first, to pose the questions that were asked as a result of the framing of the bill and, secondly, to reply in the words that were used by those who were questioned.

It was said that there should be a clear statement of objectives for new crown corporations and a clear requirement for the submission of corporation plans for revenue, as well as a clear provision for plans for borrowing and for reporting to Parliament on the activities of crown corporations. The Auditor General was asked if any one of these criteria was met by the bill, to which he said:

You would normally expect to find those criteria residing in a special bill incorporating a (crown) corporation. On first reading, it is not apparent to me that any of those criteria are met or reside in this bill.

I am kind of glad that Senator Lamontagne has found it necessary to withdraw. It was a little disconcerting to have him smiling at me every time I made a point. It made one feel that one was stupid or ignorant. But I would have him and everybody else know that these points are not points made by me. They are points made by knowledgeable, intelligent and educated witnesses who appeared before the committee. What is more, I do not believe that anybody who listened to those responses was a bit pleased to get them, because none of them was in accord with what it was hoped would be the answer. All of them were in accord with the opposition questions that were asked.

I have been careful not to say who asked the questions, because somebody might say that I am being partisan. However, I can admit now that the questions were asked by an opposition member, but, by the Lord, it was not opposition members who answered them. It was independent officials, the Auditor General and others of his ilk.

If there is anybody who does not want to listen to what I say, and if somebody thinks they should smile at what I say, or if somebody even thinks they should smile and then leave the chamber, as some have done, then I say to those honourable senators, "Don't forget, you are not leaving the chamber because of what I am saying; you are leaving the chamber because you cannot stand what other people who know what they are talking about say."

Hon. Jack Marshall: The truth hurts.

Senator Donahoe: I think I have said enough. If I have not done anything else, I have made the audience realize that I am opposed to Bill C-102. I propose to vote against it. The reasons I have cited are numerous and compelling and should appeal to everybody.

Senator Marshall: They are convincing reasons.

Senator Donahoe: But I would not want everybody to leave this chamber, or I would not want to finish my speech without making it abundantly understood that there are many other criticisms of the bill which were made directly and which were answered just as devastatingly by those who were asked to express their opinions. So, not because I have run out of arguments, not because I do not think it is worthwhile to make the argument, but merely because I am an old man and I have been a long time on my feet, I am about to bring my speech to its conclusion.

I do want to say that I listened with the greatest of interest to the learned senator who introduced the bill. Whether I failed to understand him because of my own shortcomings or because he fails to understand the English language is something for you to decide. All I can say is that he may take whatever view of the bill he elects. He may construe the words used any way he likes, but I much prefer to construe them in the form in which they were construed by the Auditor General of Canada who was called, not by the opposition but by the government to support its case, and who, unlike some people, felt obliged to tell the truth. When he told the truth it was devastating, and he showed that the bill is not what it is represented to be. It contains defects; it contains all those defects that I have elucidated, as well as other defects which I have had the mercy not to bring before you.

When I spoke last evening I tried to have this debate deferred until consideration had been given to the bill by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I understand that it has been referred to that committee for pre-study, and I was informed and accept the fact that I was wrong on the procedure when I said that the bill should be referred to the committee, and that the study given by that committee should be a true study of the bill and not a pre-study. I was further informed that the pre-study would be merged with the study on the bill when it is referred to that committee. The pre-study will disappear, in fact, because truly the bill is then before the committee.

I had hoped—and this was a sincere hope—that the wisdom of that committee would be available to me and others who might feel impelled to speak on the bill before being called upon to speak in this debate. I was informed that this would not be the case, that I must speak from my own limited understanding of the bill. I have relied, to a great extent, upon the views of people who, it might be said, know the meaning of the questions being asked, who know the meanings of the answers being given, and in every case those meanings are of a quality and of a kind that would prevail upon anyone who wishes to allow himself to be prevailed upon, who wishes to open his mind, to vote against the bill. I intend to vote against the bill, and I invite my honourable colleagues to join me in doing so.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Godfrey speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to refer to two matters raised in yesterday's debate. One was to the effect that in one clause of the bill it refers to six sitting days of Parliament, and in another it refers to five sitting days of Parliament.

This morning I tried to find out why that was, but was unsuccessful. However, I have been told by officials of the department that they will research the matter and will be prepared to answer those questions when they appear before the committee.

Another point was brought up by Senator Smith relating to the meaning of section 6(3), which states:

A corporation is for all purposes an agent of Her Majesty and its powers may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

I spoke to an official of the department this morning, and he gave me a legal opinion on the effect of subsection 2 and subsection 3 combined, and I must say that I was not any the wiser after hearing what he had to say. His opinion really referred to the effect of subsection 2, which says that the corporation shall be under the direction of the minister. When I told him that I was not satisfied with his opinion, he told me that he would look into the matter further and would be prepared to answer when he appeared before the committee.

As to Senator Donahoe's remarks today, I must say that I am a little concerned as to what I should say. I must say that at one time I was embarrassed for Senator Donahoe. I was embarrassed for him because, obviously, he is unaware of the fact that on May 17 amendments were proposed at the report stage in the House of Commons which took care of many of the specific matters to which he objected in his speech.

However, I became rather—

Senator Donahoe: Will you permit a question?

Senator Godfrey: Yes.

Senator Donahoe: Does the honourable senator refer to the fact that the bill was amended to include the so-called sunset clause?

Senator Godfrey: No, I am referring to the question of a negative resolution. For example, Senator Donahoe said that even though a corporation was turned down by the House of Commons on a negative resolution, as long as the Senate did not concur, it had no effect. That was the situation before May 17.

As Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, as I pointed out in my speech, I wrote to the minister objecting to this on March 31. We brought this concern to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and thrashed it out there, and, finally, on May 17 they saw the light and brought in the amendments which substantially—and I used the word "substantially" in my speech—take care of the objections made.

Now, I must say that I am more embarrassed for myself than for Senator Donahoe, because I only started preparing my speech yesterday morning, so a great deal of my speech had to be given extemporaneously and, obviously, I did not make it very clear. In other words, had Senator Donahoe been listening, and had I made it clear, it would have been quite obvious to him that what he referred to was completely irrelevant in view of the fact that the amendments were made on May 17.

I do not think I need say any more than that, except to commend to Senator Donahoe the re-reading of what I said yesterday, and if he reads it two or three times, he may understand it, because I was not very clear. If he does that, he might be able to understand my poor attempt to explain the bill.

If there is any further question on that matter, it can be put to the officials of the department when they appear before the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Godfrey moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL CONSUMPTION STANDARDS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Maurice Riel moved the second reading of Bill C-107, respecting Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards.

He said: Honourable senators, before giving you my comments on this bill, I would like to congratulate Senator Donahoe. He was very eloquent in his comments on various bills, and although we do not necessarily share his opinion, what he says is always most interesting and, I find, most educational. I would like to thank him for his speech, and I may say that his apologies for having taken up so much of our time were entirely unnecessary, because what he had to say was very interesting. I know that my colleague, Senator Godfrey, also has considerable experience, and I appreciated this opportunity to listen to the senator defending his point of view and engaging in lightning exchanges with the opposite side. I have always found this kind of debate entirely fascinating, and it is always a pleasure to listen to the senator on such occasions.

With your leave, honourable colleagues, I shall continue in English, and make use of my constitutional right to use either official language of this country in this House, as I would anywhere else in this country.

[English]

I am pleased to address honourable senators on the second reading of Bill C-107, respecting motor vehicle fuel consumption standards. This bill, as you may recall, is an important part of the National Energy Program. It is a key conservation measure aimed at reducing the consumption of fuel by motor vehicles in Canada. I wish to remind honourable senators of the magnitude of the oil savings which we believe can be achieved by this program. These savings have been estimated at 300,000 barrels of oil per day by 1990, compared to the fuel that would be required by vehicles maintained at a 1979 level of fuel consumption performance. This represents a sizeable reduction in transportation energy use—the largest sector of oil consumption in Canada.

● (1600)

The government's commitment to this program dates back at least six years, and has embraced a history of discussions with the motor vehicle producing industry, as well as numerous Canadian government agencies, and those in other countries. The result has been a successful voluntary fuel consumption program, supported by Bill C-107. The importance of this bill, and the large measure of agreement on its role, was evident in its successful consideration in the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Energy Legislation. The performance of industry under this voluntary program provides further evidence of success. The targets for fuel consumption performance have not only been met but have also been exceeded by industry to date, and it is expected, based on this experience, that the trend will continue. This willingness and expressed commitment of industry to co-operate in a voluntary program makes a good case for retaining the voluntary nature of the program.

Honourable senators, as a means of enhancing this voluntary program, industry and the federal government will work together in many areas. Industry is certainly willing to participate beyond the current program levels, and the government intends to harness this co-operation—participating fully ourselves—in order to co-ordinate all interests affected by the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act, including, for example, the fuel producing industries. The government hopes to focus this effort through industry-government working groups to be established in the numerous areas that the act encompasses.

The proposed Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act will authorize the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Transport to continue the voluntary fuel consumption program.

The first part of the act will provide for the assignment of a fuel consumption number to every vehicle sold in Canada. These numbers will appear on the information sticker affixed to each vehicle, and will be included in the data contained in Transport Canada's Fuel Consumption Guide. These figures will also be used in the Minister of Transport's calculations of the fuel consumption of vehicles sold by all manufacturers in Canada.

The categories of vehicles covered by the act are deemed to be general. For example, all passenger automobiles constitute one category.

The existing voluntary program sets average fuel consumption standards for the vehicles of corporations for each year up to 1985. Corporations may reduce fuel consumption by selling a larger number of their more economical vehicles, or by upgrading the fuel consumption of each model at the design stage. The government expects that this program will remain voluntary, unless corporations ignore it.

The authority to set standards and to impose penalties is contained in the act, but the government does not intend that these provisions should be proclaimed. Just having written these sections into the law, it is hoped, will be enough to accomplish the government's goals. Detailed information is needed for the consumer and for the government. For now, the practice of setting voluntary fuel consumption standards will continue, along with an improved flow of information.

The primary beneficiary here is not, in fact, the government, but the consumer. We expect automobile manufacturers and dealers to prominently display energy consumption ratings and to give the consumer the chance to make intelligent, informed decisions when in the vehicle marketplace. The government will compile the data to monitor the accuracy of the ratings and the progress made in getting more kilometres out of every drop of fuel. It can also get a better idea of what is happening by way of research and how the new technology is performing. Such information is crucial to developing government policy.

As the situation now stands, we cannot be sure that such complete information will be supplied.

The consumer will also benefit by having the attention of automobile manufacturers focused on Canadian needs, Canadian conditions and our supplies of gasoline or alternative fuels.

Nothing in this bill should cause undue hardship to the industry, which we all know is hard pressed these days. We are really asking for very little additional information beyond what the industry now supplies. This act merely ensures that the information will, in fact, be forthcoming. The expense will be minor and the benefits potentially great.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Molson for the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I did not adjourn Senator Molson's motion with the intention of prolonging the debate but, rather, to amplify some of the remarks he made. I certainly do not oppose this motion, but while I am still in order I should like to make a remark because it pertains to the question of our rules.

I think we must consider—and I hope there will be some such initiative in the Senate—limiting the time spent on Question Period. I believe that in the other place the time limit is one hour. Our Question Period this afternoon went on for approximately an hour and twenty minutes or an hour and a half. It is overly long and uninformative and, speaking personally, I find it excruciatingly boring.

I would hope that I would not have to try to initiate such a move in the Standing Rules and Orders Committee because I am not a member of that committee, but perhaps some honourable senators who have more influence than I do in this chamber, such as my colleague on the opposite side, would be prepared to sponsor such a move. Such a time limit would prevent the undue prolongation of our proceedings such as has been the case in the past few years. What I have just said is by way of an aside.

The motion we have before us, by Senator Molson, contains two important sections. One is in regard to the appointment of a Speaker pro tempore. I think that it is perfectly clear and that there is no controversial aspect to it.

The other, if adopted, would remove from the rules section 49(1)(c), which, as all senators recall, states:

● (1610)

a senator who declines to vote shall assign his reasons therefor, following which the Speaker shall submit to the Senate the question, "Shall the senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?", which shall be decided without debate.

[Senator Riel]

Honourable senators, this issue has quite a historical background. In speaking today, I am not indirectly but, rather, directly paying a tribute to Senator Bosa. He and I disagree on many points. Of course, I do agree that we should change all our cartographical references from "Cabot" to "Caboto." I believe that would be part of the logical evolution of our country. However, apart from that agreement, most of the time I do not share his views.

How he recognized this problem as early as he did gives me an idea of his prescience in a matter as obscure as this.

Historically, what happened was this: A reference was made to the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, and on November 13, 1979, a report was presented by the committee. Thereafter, Senator Bosa asked that the report be amended to include the elimination of the paragraph that this motion now proposes to eliminate. At that time, I do not think many of us were very concerned about whether it should remain in the rules or be eliminated.

Senator Bosa had some interesting comments on the matter. I do not think many of us understood what the retention of that paragraph might lead to. He moved an amendment to include the elimination of this paragraph. That was done on November 14 of that same year, 1979.

At that point my honourable colleague, Senator Frith, intervened and spoke to Senator Bosa's amendment. I refer to his speech of November 27, 1979, when, in his usual eloquent and articulate manner, he stated why he was opposed to the amendment; in other words, why he would be opposed to this motion today. He said:

I like the present rule. That is why I am suggesting that we vote against this proposed amendment. I am proud that we have a rule that requires us to stand up and be counted. If we do not wish to vote on a question, we can sneak out of the chamber, but if we stay we have to explain our reason.

He went on to state:

I would stand and say, "Honourable senators, I am not going to sneak out of this chamber. I am a Liberal—That is, "Liberal" with a capital "L".

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It was corrected in the "blues"!

Senator Lang: He went on to say:

—I am against this legislation, but it is before us in fulfillment of a mandate granted by the people—

I will comment on that in a moment.

He also said:

—"It has been passed by the House of Commons. Although I am against this bill, I am going to decline to vote because I do not think it is my place as a senator to vote against the will of the people, as exemplified by a vote and by passage in the House of Commons of a bill in specific fulfillment of a clear mandate."

That is a pretty compelling although fallacious argument, and one, I think, that goes to the root of the function of this chamber.

Senator Frith went on to deal with Senator Bosa's contention that this rule was an anomaly in most parliamentary chambers around the world. Senator Frith dismissed that argument, saying:

—the honourable senator has said... the Senate of Canada is an anomaly and, therefore, not in step with everyone else.

Honourable senators, I think we should regard this matter as something not completely uncontentious, but I could not be more strongly in favour of the elimination of this paragraph.

What may have revived interest in this matter was the fact that I felt bound by the mandatory words of that paragraph to rise and explain why I had differed from the government position in the final vote on the Constitution resolution in December of last year.

Notwithstanding that, I know perfectly well that any senator can give reasons for his abstention in the course of the debate; he does not have to do it at the point of the vote. I do not think any senator is going to lose anything by this proposed deletion. In fact, I think it may make it more incumbent upon him to explain his reasons for his abstention at the proper time, which is while the debate is in progress.

I hope honourable senators will support this motion, and I hope my honourable colleague, Senator Frith, will be prepared to reconsider his previously well articulated and recorded opinion on this matter in 1979.

Senator Flynn: He was in opposition then. He was prolonging the Question Period at that time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the question is put, I was invited by my colleague, Senator Lang, to make my position clear in the context of the comments I made in 1979.

I attended the meeting of the committee at which the decision was taken to recommend this change in the rules, and I was persuaded by what was said there, that is, that there is merit in changing the rule. I also became convinced that most senators are in favour of this change. I am persuaded by that fact—the Senate, of course, being the master of its own proceedings on a matter of this kind—as well as by the arguments put forward in the committee. I can now, in clear conscience, support the report of this committee.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, not having been privy to the discussions before the committee, I have not been privileged to be made aware of all the material which was so powerful and convincing as to cause the Deputy Leader of the Government to change his mind.

Perhaps Senator Lang would not mind stating the reasons which lead him to the conclusion that this is a bad rule and that it should be changed.

Senator Lang: Any senator has the opportunity to explain his abstention while the debate is in progress. If he has to do so when the vote is in progress, it creates a mechanical problem of the first order. That is really all I am saying.

Senator Smith: The deputy leader is very easily convinced on a matter of mechanics.

Senator Lang: In reply to Senator Smith, I would point out that law is bound up in the interstices of procedure.

Senator Smith: Sometimes the intricacies of procedure compel someone to publicly state his reasons for doing something or for abstaining from doing something. Nothing the senator has said in answer to my question seems to deal with the merits of the powerful arguments referred to by the Deputy Leader of the Government which have brought him to favour the abolition of this rule.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-THIRD MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-third Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Key Largo, Florida, from 4th to 8th March, 1982, and to the Report of such meeting.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will remember that there have been interventions by Senator Hicks and Senator Roblin in this debate. Since it appeared at the end of Senator Roblin's speech that no other senator wished to speak on the inquiry, I moved the adjournment of the debate to ensure that all senators were given a chance to participate.

If by tomorrow no other senator has indicated his desire to intervene in this debate, I shall suggest that it be considered debated.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 10, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

PARLIAMENT

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION OF DIEFENBAKER GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, 25 years ago today, on June 10, 1957—this brings back memories for Senator Lamontagne but not as unhappy as those of March 31, 1958—elections were held in Canada, and among those elected were four of our colleagues who subsequently continued their careers here in the Senate, and far more peacefully, I should say, than in the other place. I thought it was appropriate to mention this. The colleagues in question are Senators Walker, Muir, Phillips and Macquarrie, and all four belong to the class of 1957.

As far as I am concerned, I have to admit that I was a candidate and I lost by a narrow margin of 8,000 votes! So, I might as well admit, since we are on the subject—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: You were elected in 1958 and then—

Senator Flynn: The hard time we gave you in the riding in Quebec East did not do me any good. There were some Liberals who wanted to take this out on me.

In any case, during my campaign in 1957, I told my wife: "All you have to do during the campaign is tell me every day that I am going to be beaten. And so she did. On the morning of June 10, she said: "I hope you will not lose your deposit." I told her that this was going a bit too far.

I must say that the initial results were such that I was afraid of losing my deposit, which I managed to keep by several hundred votes.

THE HONOURABLE PAUL C. LAFOND

INVITATION TO ADDRESS THE NAVAL OFFICERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that tomorrow Senator Paul Lafond will be addressing the main meeting of the Naval Officers Association of Canada. As a life member of, and because of my interest, concern and almost nostalgic association with, that organization, I must say I am delighted that Senator Lafond is being so honoured. Of course, he is being asked to speak because of the significance of the Subcommittee on National Defence, which he has so ably chaired over the last year-and-a-half, and particularly because of the significance of its recent report.

That committee has performed a function which far transcends its anticipated effect upon the general public of Canada, and has served a real need. The Senate owes a great debt of gratitude to Senator Lafond for the work he has done, and for the quality and substance of his subcommittee's report.

In asking Senator Lafond to be the main speaker at the meeting in Vancouver, the Naval Officers Association of Canada has bestowed on him an accolade which is most deserved. I hope we in the Senate recognize the achievement that that represents.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-103, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and to enact provisions related thereto.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 10, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill S-27, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of The Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 2, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. CARL GOLDBERG,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 15, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just a few words about the adjournment, to recall what we said previously regarding next week and the week after.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The next two weeks?

Senator Frith: Exactly. Next week the Senate will be sitting as usual, that is, Tuesday evening at eight o'clock, but the week after, we shall be sitting at eight o'clock on Monday, two o'clock on Tuesday and two o'clock on Wednesday. The Senate will adjourn for Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, until the following Monday, and that week we shall also be sitting at eight o'clock on Monday, and two o'clock on Tuesday and Wednesday. After that, it will be Dominion Day or Canada Day.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

JUNIOR OIL COMPANIES' PRODUCTION—PROPOSED PRICE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. A lobby on behalf of junior oil companies producing less than a thousand barrels a day claims to have the support of the chairmen of the Ontario and Atlantic Liberal caucuses for a proposal that such companies receive the world price for their production.

● (1410)

Is the minister, who represents Alberta in the Cabinet, prepared to lend his support to that proposition?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not quite sure that I understand the purport of the question because a large proportion of the NEP update announced on June 1 has that thrust.

Senator Charbonneau: The minister has said that Cabinet was prepared to offer the New Oil Reference Price to wells that had been suspended for three years, but not to others. In other words, there seems to be discrimination.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall have to look into that very specific matter.

The new-oil price has, of course, been offered to production that was brought in prior to the 1981 discovery requirement that was in there before, going back to 1974—I am not sure of the exact date; it was either 1973 or 1974. Obviously, all the junior oil companies involved in that will benefit from it.

There is more, of course, but if it is only on that one specific matter that some wells have been shut down, no matter when the discovery was made, that is somewhat different. That makes the question somewhat different, obviously.

Senator Charbonneau: We would appreciate knowing the exact reference because, as I read it, it appeared that it was only for those that had been suspended for three years.

Senator Olson: I will look into that. I should advise my honourable friend that I have in front of me—and I do not want to be guilty of what Senator Murray does all the time—an editorial from the Edmonton Journal with a headline that says the junior oil companies are jubilant over the announcement that was made.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Is the Minister of State for Economic Development in a position to advise the Senate as to what level the bank rate was set at today and whether anyone is jubilant about that?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe the bank rate was set at 16.20 per cent at noon today, which is an upward revision from last week, when it was 15.89 per cent. I am not sure that there has been time for people to indicate whether they are jubilant about it.

Senator Murray: While the dollar goes down, down, down, the bank rate goes up, up, up.

In view of the statements by Mr. MacEachen to the effect that all the government's economic policies will be on the table for reconsideration by caucus and Cabinet, I would ask the minister whether monetary policy will be on the table in these discussions?

Senator Olson: Senator Murray knows as well as I do that the Bank of Canada has a responsibility for managing monetary policy in this country. Is he advocating that we put it on the table so that we change the kinds of directions and authority that Parliament has given the Bank of Canada?

Senator Murray: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister had a great deal to say at the Versailles summit, and since, about real interest rates in the United States—the difference between the rate of inflation and the prime rate. Is it the position of the government, in view of this latest increase in the bank rate, that these high interest rates fight inflation or contribute to inflation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that debate has been going on for a long time. I know that an argument can be made for either side. Let me tell you some of the factors that must be taken into account before arriving at a conclusion, which Senator Murray seems to be asking me to do.

• (1415)

Before a committee of the other place, for example, a number of bankers have described bank profits and other elements of the question in a certain fashion, and have also pointed to the negative effect of high interest rates upon businesses. There is no question about that effect. Then Mr. Mulholland, who is, I believe, the chairman of the board of the Bank of Montreal, said that the proportion of pre-tax cash flow of industry going in interest payments in the fourth quarter of 1981 was up very significantly to 66 per cent, according to his calculation. A representative of the Bank of Commerce said that any arbitrary lowering of interest rates below those of the United States would cause "severe weakening in the strength of the banks," and a weaker dollar. He indicated—and this is his statement, not mine—that about $130 billion could shift with little more than a phone call.

I think, when this kind of question is asked, that all of these things must be taken into account in order to avoid an uninformed conclusion.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable minister for putting that information on the record. Might I ask him, then, whether the government and the Bank of Canada are following an anti-inflationary policy or an exchange rate policy?

Senator Olson: Both.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INDIAN TRIBES—PURCHASE OF FISHING FLEET

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State, Senator Austin. Those of us from British Columbia are all aware of the importance of the fishing industry as a form of employment for the Indians on the west coast. This is an area in which they are particularly skilled.

Has the government yet made a decision regarding support for certain northern British Columbia Indian tribes that are anxious to purchase the small boat fishing fleet of B.C. Packers based at Port Edward for their own use there?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I thank the honourable senator for his question, which is of considerable concern to the economic affairs of our province, British Columbia.

[Senator Olson.]

The government this morning made its decision to support, financially, at a cost of $11,730,000, the purchase of the B.C. Packers' small boat fleet of 246 vessels on behalf of the Northern Tribal Council of British Columbia.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: We will be assisting in the formation of a northern native fishery corporation and will be providing an infusion of capital. The natives themselves will be providing $24 million of the total capital and operating costs required. It is our belief that, through this investment, we will provide a sustained economic basis for a substantial community of people in British Columbia, with more than 250 people involved in the fishery itself and more than 1,000 on shore assisting in the development of that particular industry.

Senator Perrault: An excellent question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Bien orchestré!

Hon. Martial Asselin: Bien orchestré!

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before we proceed to delayed answers, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with reference to the continuing military conflict in Lebanon, with its appalling and growing loss of life and the increasing disturbance, not only to that area but to the whole world. I note that the Prime Minister has, on behalf of Canada, added an ingredient of condemnation and has labelled the activity as fueling the flames of violence and hatred in the Middle East. Could the minister tell me whether there has been any reply to the Canadian overtures which were outlined by the Prime Minister, and, if so, what is the nature of those responses?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Macquarrie has made reference to a message that was sent by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to the Prime Minister of Israel on June 9. Of course, the Prime Minister's communication was a balanced one. In addition to his remarks concerning Israeli actions, he deplored and condemned as "heinous crimes" acts of terrorism against targets in Israel and elsewhere. I can say, however, that I have not as yet been advised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that a reply has been received from the Government of Israel.

• (1420)

If honourable senators would like to have the text of the Prime Minister's letter to the Prime Minister of Israel incorporated in the text of today's Hansard, I would be pleased to see that that is done.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In light of the views expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the effect that the Palestinians are entitled to a recognizable homeland, on the West Bank or in the Gaza Strip, for example, can he advise as to whether we regard the current military invasion as a serious deterrent to the realization of that goal? I also wonder if the Government of Canada realizes the seriousness of the situation in the Middle East and the conflagration it may lead to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we do not underestimate the gravity of the situation in the Middle East. It certainly carries with it the possibility of even more widespread conflict, which is of serious concern not only to Canada but also to many other countries.

Perhaps I can help to answer the honourable senator's question by reading that short letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Begin. It is as follows:

With Israeli air-raids in Lebanon and rocket attacks on northern Israel already in progress, my letter to you on June 5 counselled restraint to avoid the dangers that further military action would bring. In that same letter I said we deplored and condemned as heinous crimes acts of terrorism against targets in Israel and elsewhere; but I also said that it was important to avoid actions which fuel rather than dampen the flames of violence and hatred in the Middle East.

I am dismayed by the subsequent escalation of the conflict represented by the massive movement of Israeli forces into Lebanon. Great human suffering is being caused, and the rapid northward expansion of Israeli operations is posing an increasing risk of a wider war. We in Canada understand your natural concern for Israeli lives in the Galilee, and believe that acts of violence against Israel and its citizens as well as against all others in the area must cease. But we cannot accept the proposition that the present military activities are justified or that they will provide the long-term security which you seek for the Israeli people.

I appeal to you to respond positively to the unanimous Security Council resolution by agreeing to a cease-fire and withdrawing immediately and unconditionally from Lebanese territory so that the difficult but necessary task of working for reconciliation in the area can begin again.

Canada's position is one of basic support for the United Nations and the position taken by the Security Council.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are there no copies of that available?

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to provide for the Honourable Senator Asselin a copy of the statement by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I will have it copied for him, hopefully within a few minutes. I regret that the message was not available in both languages for me to distribute to the opposition earlier this afternoon.

Senator Asselin: Is that the only reason?

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hope Senator Muir will not mind my asking a supplementary question.

I am not quarrelling with the content of the letter at all—in fact, it is, in my judgment, far better than what the Prime Minister is reported to have said two days ago—but the government leader indicates that this was a letter. What is the estimated time of delivery?

Senator Perrault: It is a message.

Senator Macquarrie: You used the expression "letter".

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me state that the heading on the document provided to me from the Office of the Prime Minister, is: "Text of Message of June 9 from Prime Minister Trudeau—"

Senator Macquarrie: My honourable friend understands, I am sure, why I reacted as I did to his use of the word "letter". What we are talking about here is a blitzkrieg, where things are happening in a matter of hours, not days.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator makes a good point, which I have been pleased to clarify.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would advise us if a similar message was sent to any other country, for example, Syria, Lebanon and the PLO?

Senator Perrault: That will be made the subject of a question, which I will address to the Office of the Prime Minister.

• (1425)

Senator Marshall: Would the Leader of the Government indicate what Canada's position is with regard to the PLO, whose direction in life is to destroy Israel? It has disregarded the lives of individuals by locating its defence headquarters in a civilian area. What is Canada's position in that regard?

Senator Perrault: In the past the government has condemned violence of all kinds, including violent acts by those who purport to be acting on behalf of the PLO. As honourable senators are aware, there was the recent assassination attempt against the Israeli ambassador in London. The Canadian government expressed its shock to learn of the attack on the life of the Israeli ambassador. We stated that it was a heinous crime which we strongly condemned. Canadians of all parties have deplored violence, and anyone who has visited Israel and the Galilee area realizes the vulnerability of the people of that area to violent attack from the heights above. Life would be intolerable without some degree of security for the people of those northern settlements in Israel.

Senator Marshall: You do not have to explain.

Senator Perrault: I know that the Honourable Senator Marshall is aware of the situation. I have been there, as have other honourable senators. All of us understand just how serious the problem of security has become in northern Israel.

On the occasion of the assassination attempt, the Canadian government commented further:

We are concerned lest this action—
That is, the attempted assassination.

—provoke retaliatory action by the Israeli government which might lead to the outbreak of major hostilities in the area. We urge all concerned—

We indicated this to the other governments.

—to exercise restraint.

So, when that assassination attempt took place, Canada immediately said that there was a danger of retaliation and that the action which had been attributed to the PLO, whether or not it was an officially sanctioned act, could lead to precisely the sad and unfortunate events that did occur within a few hours.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I have not been to Israel, but I was in Beirut at Easter. The Canadian embassy staff are within half a mile of the PLO sector of Beirut, and, therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the fact that at this point in time the embassy must be in the midst of heavy fighting—there was fighting going on when I was there at Easter—has any thought been given to getting the Canadian staff out of the city of Beirut and beyond what appears to be a major battleground?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am able to report that our embassy has been contacting Canadians in affected areas by phone, wherever possible, to inquire about their situation and to recommend that they move to safer zones, if possible. Those who are in safer areas do not need to leave. Our embassy in Lebanon continues to function. Our ambassador informed us on June 9, yesterday, at 1315 hours Ottawa time, that all staff and dependants in the Beirut area were safe. Non-essential personnel and dependants had gone temporarily to less exposed areas, and a small skeleton staff was still in Beirut.

The general situation with respect to Canadians is described in this message which has been received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Other inquiries will go forward and hopefully at the next sitting of the Senate an updated report can be provided.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Does he realize that those of us who ask these questions are not taking sides? We are hopeful that the Government of Canada, with its good record as, shall we say, an honest broker, will try to do its utmost to prevail upon both sides of the conflict, the PLO and Israel, to cool it a little, because we do not know what may transpire. The situation could well develop into a world conflagration. I speak for myself alone and no one else, and I am not taking sides either way when I say that I hope we shall use our good offices, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs and through the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, to make known how serious and sad we regard the situation to be.

● (1430)

Senator Perrault: I think the honourable senator can feel assured that this is indeed the position of the Canadian government. It is a position which, I think, enjoys the general support of all the political parties represented in this chamber and in the other place.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable colleagues, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. It has largely been pre-empted by what Senator Marshall has asked. I appreciate what Senator Muir has just said, that these questions are not to be construed as taking sides in the conflict. One, of course, has certain sympathies, but very often one is like myself, a novice in the field of international affairs and not even a very keen observer of them. Yet, I am struck by the fact that communications of the kind that the Leader of the Government says the Prime Minister has directed to Israel are discussed, talked about, and so on, but I have never heard of criticism of any kind, written or oral, directed toward Syria for its occupation of Lebanon. What I would like to ask is: Has there been any overt act on the part of the Canadian government to criticize what appears to me to be the occupation of Lebanon by Syrian forces?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to provide evidence to indicate that Canada has deplored the violation of human rights in the Middle East and in other parts of the world. That has been our consistent position. At one point in my time in Parliament, I served as the Canadian representative on the Palestine refugee question at the United Nations. Then, as now, in a balanced way, Canada consistently deplored acts of violence and the restriction of human rights.

With regard to the suggestion that somehow Canada is singling out Israel for special criticism, we are not, and it is not correct to say that we are condemning one country and somehow excluding others. For example, during the seventh emergency special session of the United Nations to discuss the question of Palestine we expressed our revulsion at the tragic loss of life and the desecration of the holy site of the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem.

However, Canada voted against the resolution which emerged because of its contentious nature. Among many other things which we could not support there was a paragraph which questioned the bona fides of Israel as a member of the United Nations. That provision could be employed as a ground to limit Israel's participation in the General Assembly. As such, it was contrary to Canada's firm support for the universality of participation in the United Nations.

The Canadian record is one, I suggest, which will stand extensive scrutiny.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the honourable leader for what he has said. I have only one addition to make to my supplementary question. I trust that he will regard the question put to him as a specific question and not a general one, and not one which can be determined by somebody's determination of what are human rights. I ask the following question specifically, passing no judgment on what took place: Has any criticism ever been directed by the Government of Canada toward the apparent occupation of Lebanon by Syria?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The Government of Lebanon invited Syria to come in.

Senator Perrault: I was going to suggest to the honourable senator that the Syrian forces are there on the basis of some sort of invitation from Lebanon, but I do not want to get into the details of that particular action. I would rather take the question as notice and bring a statement to the Senate. I think that at this time of crisis those who speak for the government should not speculate. Rather, they should exercise special care that they speak on the basis of facts and with a sense of responsibility.

Senator Donahoe: With the help of the deputy leader, that comes very near to the kind of answer I desired.

Senator Macquarrie: If everybody else is satisfied, I would like to come back to the question which the government leader answered before Senator Stollery made his useful inquiry. Listening very carefully, I began to wonder if it was the view of the Canadian government that the PLO was responsible for the tragic shooting of the Israeli ambassador in London, considering that Prime Minister Thatcher has indicated that the chief of the PLO in Britain was on the same hit list as that unfortunate man. If the government has that information, I think it should be divulged.

Question Period is not the time for revelations of conscience and preferences. I never have too much difficulty in making my own preferences known when I think of the millions of people who are losing their homes forcibly, but that is not the issue today.

Senator Perrault: Honourables senators, I have no information. I have no evidence with me this afternoon which indicates that the Canadian government believes that the PLO is responsible for the assassination attempt in London. However, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The representative to the United Nations on Canada AM this morning, when faced with that question, indicated that it is a sector of the PLO that has broken away from the main organization that claims responsibility for that action. These facts are known, and I would think that the people should stop sitting on both sides of the fence.

Senator Perrault: The question was whether we had any information on the matter here. I do not have any information here, and an inquiry will be made.

Senator Macquarrie: Meanwhile, I will believe Margaret Thatcher.

Senator Marshall: Bloody hypocrisy.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MCCRACKEN REPORT—STATUS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on February 18, 1982 Senator Marshall asked a question concerning the status of the McCracken report. This report was prepared by Mr. McCracken, a special adviser to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As such, the report in question was not tabled in either house. At the time Senator

Marshall asked the question, the Minister of Veterans Affairs was awaiting the report which was in the final stage of preparation.

On April 1, 1982, Senator Marshall implied that the McCracken report had been distributed to the members of the other place before it had been distributed to honourable senators. We have ascertained the facts, and this is not the case. The minister, after having studied the report, made it available as a courtesy to honourable senators as well as to members of the other place. The minister has assured me that the distribution was made on the same day to members of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science and to members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs of the House of Commons.

The reason why the answer was so long in coming, honourable senators, is that the Minister of Veterans Affairs thought that he had responded fully to Senator Marshall's concerns through the distribution of the McCracken report to the Senate Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science and through the consideration of that report by the same committee.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it is not a serious situation, but those are not the facts. I read the proceedings of the other place, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs had replied to the Veterans Affairs critic of the Progressive Conservative Party indicating just what had happened with McCracken report. While I was at the meeting of that committee, which deals with matters of Veterans Affairs, the minister tabled the McCracken report and, upon being questioned, gave the same information that the Leader of the Government has just given. So he need not tell me stories out of school when the facts are right there. They are in the proceedings of the Veterans Affairs Committee of the House of Commons and in the proceedings of our committee. If the honourable senator wishes to read the facts I will bring them to him.

Senator Perrault: I regret that Senator Marshall has stated that we are distributing facts "that are out of school" and that he has inferred that there is a deliberate effort to deceive him.

Senator Marshall: I am not suggesting that it is deliberate.

Senator Perrault: That is certainly not the case. A conscientious inquiry was undertaken, and I have given the information that has come back from the minister.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have every respect for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I am sure he is saying what he thinks is the case, but I am telling you what I know is the case.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question, asked by Senator Nurgitz on April 27, 1982, concerning the advertising campaign of the Department of Employment and Immigration, which has been discussed from time to time in this chamber. The cost, over two fiscal years, of the advertising campaign—I think it could be better described as an informational campaign—was $4.6 million, including all production, research and service charges.

Advertisements appeared in the print and electronic media. Image transfers on billboards were also part of the overall multi-media mix. The purpose of the advertising campaign was to emphasize training opportunities available for Canadians. The conducting of such a campaign to heighten awareness of the Department of Employment and Immigration training programs was recommended by an all-party committee on Parliament in its task force report, Work for Tomorrow.

● (1440)

The all-party committee recommended the program; the program was brought into being; and we felt a responsibility to inform Canadians of some of the details of the program.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Martial Asselin: On a point of order, honourable senators. Between April 1980 and May 1981, I have had five questions taken as notice by the Leader of the Government or the ministers sitting opposite. I have as yet to receive any answers. Could this be taken care of so that I could be given the answers before the end of the session?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, every effort will be made to answer the questions on the Order Paper. There is a great deal of work, as honourable senators know, involved in preparing replies, and a great deal of expense in a time of restraint.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Ignorance is no way to balance the budget.

Senator Perrault: A meeting was held today to review those questions which, as yet, have not been answered and, hopefully, those answers will be provided before the Senate adjourns for the summer.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to add something by way of a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Flynn yesterday concerning the status of Bill C-53, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

I asked whether the information I gave in answer to a question yesterday, and my impression about the legislation we would be receiving, was more or less accurate, and I was told that it was, but you will remember—

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Which is it? More or less?

Senator Frith: It is neither more nor less, but exactly. The honourable senator is quite right.

Honourable senators, I did undertake to ask about Bill C-53, and the following is what I have been informed.

Bill C-53 is still in committee in the other place. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has spent over 27 hours studying Bill C-53 so far. It is, therefore, difficult to say when we might receive the bill here.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question was whether the government intended to try to have it passed before the end of the month.

THE HONOURABLE JACK AUSTIN, P.C.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of personal privilege and one that affects all rights and responsibilities of honourable senators.

An Hon. Senator: All the rights?

Senator Austin: All the rights, because it affects our dignity, and it affects our reputation.

There are serious matters that occupy us in both domestic and international affairs, but our balance requires a sense of humour about our being in the world if we are to be the purveyors of "sober second thought".

I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate a letter which I have written to Messrs. John Gray and Doug Small, co-captains of the Parliamentary Press Gallery Softball Team, after due consultation with honourable senators. The letter, which is dated June 9, 1982, reads as follows:

Dear John and Doug:

It has been noted by the Senate that there exists a remoteness of galactic quality between the Red Chamber and the Press Gallery, which is due largely to a preoccupation of the latter with the minutiae of the moment rather than with the sterling and substantive issues of our times, which engage the former. It is believed among some senators that there are some in the Press Gallery, mainly of younger vintage, who have never seen a senator, let alone talked to one.

In order to sample the vigour and adversarial spirit, which is the "high" of the Press Gallery's day, the Senate has instructed me to issue this challenge to the Press Gallery to a trial of softball strength on the parliamentary lawn, commencing at precisely 6:00 p.m. on Wednesday, June 16th, 1982.

The name of the team representing the Senate, chosen after careful and due deliberation, and following a review process which included committee meetings in camera, is "The Sober Second Thoughts". We will have a line-up of 15 senators ready to go at the appointed moment. May I suggest in order that the game come to an appropriate termination before sunset, that the game be called at 8:00 p.m., if nine innings have not, by then, been played. May I also suggest that, should either team lead by a total of 20 runs, then at that point the game be called.

A former member of the Press Gallery has asked me to suggest that your usual roster of fat and over-forty gallery members be included on your team. This I think is ungenerous and I want you to feel free to include only fat and over-forty members if you wish.

Yours for the House of Commons windows,

JACK AUSTIN

Hon. Peter Bosa: Name the Senate players.

Senator Austin: In the interests of competitive spirit and our underlying threat, I do not think we should name the potential power of the Senate until the exact moment of the game.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As long as you include the Speaker pro tem, that is fine.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Will the St. John's Ambulance be standing by?

Senator Austin: I hope no honourable senator, even out of a sense of humour, will depreciate any member or the collectivity of this chamber.

Senator Flynn: It is very difficult to do that.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983, which was presented June 8, 1982.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance covers the reasons for the four votes contained in supplementary estimates (A) and explains their significance quite adequately.

Perhaps it would not be amiss for me to spend a few minutes in pointing out to honourable senators what these votes are for. They are in two categories. The first two votes relate to the Department of Employment and Immigration, and the last two votes relate to the Department of External Affairs. Vote 15a, which is the first vote relating to the Department of Employment and Immigration, increases by $95.096 million the moneys available to employment and insurance contributions, bringing the total up to something over $618 million. This $95-million-plus, including $90 million for additional resources for Community Project Stream of Summer Canada, largely relates to the summer employment of students and brings that vote up to a total of $119 million.

• (1450)

We were agreeably impressed with the success of the program for summer employment of students. Granted, a lot of the money is spent to provide temporary employment but, in a good many instances, we were told—and I can verify this, having participated in the work of one or two of these offices in the Halifax area—that very often students were directed to permanent lines of employment as a result of commencing their summer occupations there.

The remaining $76 million goes to supplement the community development projects, the community services projects and the portable wage subsidy, all of which programs the members of the Treasury Board, who appeared before us, seemed to feel were working very well.

The second vote, relating to the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, had to do with the immigration program. It added additional operating costs of detention facilities of $1.2 million, and additional assistance for refugees arriving in Canada of $17.8 million, adding a vote of $19 million to the vote of over $76 million contained in the main estimates.

The reason for the increase in the cost of detention facilities is because the economy of Canada has slowed down and it is taking longer to remove immigrants from the so-called detention facilities to valid or viable employment in Canada. At the moment, there is only one detention facility left, and it is in Toronto. It houses some 400 people at the present time. Most of these immigrants are from southeast Asia and Poland. This additional vote, vote 20a, amounts to $19 million.

There are two votes under the Department of External Affairs, vote 1a and vote 10a. I can deal with them very quickly because both are $1 items transferring votes in the main estimates from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 1, and Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 10, to the Department of External Affairs, consequent upon the re-organization of those departments which the government recently announced.

The sums of money transferred are something approaching $347 million in vote 1a, and something over $113 million in vote 10a. They do not add anything to the overall budget set out in the main estimates.

In dealing with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I should also have said that the additional funds required for contributions to employment and insurance are all available from the envelope reserves, mainly from the Social Policy and Economic Development envelopes, so they too do not add to the sum total of the main estimates.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more, honourable senators. The facts to which I have briefly referred are set out completely in the report which was presented the other day by Senator Leblanc.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Do I have Senator Hicks' leave to ask for some information before the report is adopted? I have no objections to the report, but I do have a question.

If I understand correctly, a number of votes will be transferred from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Department of External Affairs, in line with the announcement on the administrative reorganization of these two departments. As far as I know, it has not yet taken place. Will or will not legislation be necessary to do so? If legislation is necessary, will whether what we are discussing is in effect or not depend on whether legislation has been passed?

Have I made myself clear?

[English]

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, my impression is that legislation will not be required, but I would not like to be categorical about this, in that it is an administrative matter and within the competence of the government of the day to re-arrange within the departments concerned.

The transfer of funds from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Department of External Affairs presented in the supplementary estimates (A) completes the transfers planned to date. However, other transfers may still be made, particularly to support units that may be required by the Department of External Affairs.

Under vote 10a, the grants and contributions provided under the Canadian Interests Abroad Program are used for the promotion of exports through payments to Canadian corporations and organizations concerned with the broadening of Canadian export trade.

It is my view, in consequence, that if we adopt this report and these supplementary estimates are approved, that is all the legislative activity that will be required.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You do not suggest that a mere approval of the report has that effect.

Senator Hicks: No. I short-circuited the process. There would have to be adoption of the budget, of course.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

PARTICIPANTS IN MANAGEMENT FOR CHANGE PROGRAM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I ask honourable senators to recognize the presence in the south gallery of members of and participants in a program called the Management for Change Program, a co-operative effort between the senior public officials of the Caribbean states and some of their counterparts in the province of Manitoba. The program was recently conducted in Manitoba. The members and participants have been in Ottawa since yesterday and will be here until tomorrow.

The membership includes representatives from various Caribbean states; that is, Anguilla, Dominica, the British Virgin Islands, Montserrat, St. Kitts, Nevis, Grenada, and St. Vincent.

I ask honourable senators to join me in welcoming them to the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-THIRD MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-third Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Key Largo, Florida, from 4th to 8th March, 1982, and to the Report of such meeting.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will remember that I moved the adjournment of this debate in order to give other senators, in addition to Senators Hicks and Roblin, an opportunity to speak to it. However, it seems that no other senator wishes to speak to it and, therefore, I suggest that it be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 15, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 15, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

MISS KRYSZYNA OLSZEWSKA—FELICITATIONS ON RE-ELECTION AS PRESIDENT OF THE CHARTERED SHORTHAND
REPORTERS' ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that you will be pleased to learn that Miss Krystyna Olszewska, one of our Hansard reporters, was re-elected President of the Chartered Shorthand Reporters' Association of Ontario, at its Ninety-Second Annual Meeting held in Gananoque on Saturday last.

The Chartered Shorthand Reporters' Association of Ontario is the oldest association of verbatim reporters in Canada, and the second oldest on the North American continent. I am sure we all wish the association another successful year under Miss Olszewska's leadership.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

EDUCATION

CONCERN FOR FUTURE OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS—
CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, may I rise on a point of personal privilege?

On February 18 I participated in a debate, initiated by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, having to do with the support of post-secondary education in Canada. In the course of that debate I asked that certain tables be appended to Debates of the Senate. Those tables showed the relative contributions to post-secondary education by the federal government and the provinces, and I said that they had been prepared from provincial sources for submission to the Council of Ministers of Education.

On the last day of May I had a letter from Lucien Perras, the Executive Director of the Council of Ministers of Education, saying that these tables had never been considered at any meeting of the education ministers, and that they were never included on the agenda of any such meeting. He continued:

Furthermore, we have checked with education ministry officials in several provinces who disclaim any knowledge of the tables attributed to them.

In the light of this, I am sorry I said that the tables were prepared for submission to the Council of Ministers of Education. They were apparently prepared by federal officials, but were never considered by the Council of Ministers of Education.

The important thing, however, is that the tables, and the accuracy of the data contained therein, have not been impugned or questioned by anyone, including the Council of Ministers of Education. Nevertheless, I am sorry for referring to them as having been on the agenda of the Council of Ministers of Education, when they never were.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL DETERMINATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-104, respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George van Roggen, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa, namely Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, Libya, Egypt, Sudan, Israel, Lebanon, Jordan, Syria, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, North and South Yemen, Oman, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Kuwait and Iran;

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the Committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the Committee may determine; and

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt this motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No. I have no problem if the sponsor wishes to explain the motion. Perhaps we can digest what he says overnight. Certainly, the list of countries is quite impressive.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, perhaps I might take a moment to explain the motion tonight. I have a possible problem tomorrow afternoon because of a commitment here in Ottawa. The steering committee of the committee, upon the conclusion of our study of Canada-United States relations and the publication of Volume III of that report some months ago, gave a good deal of consideration to what the committee could most suitably study next. We considered areas previously studied by the committee—the Caribbean in 1970, the Pacific Rim countries, including certain Asian countries in 1972, and, as you will recall, our study of relations between Canada and the European community in 1973. Of course, since then we have completed a long study on Canada's relations with the United States.

Effectively, of the areas of the world where Canada has major interests, there was left Latin America and the Middle East. The Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of the House of Commons, as you know, has been dealing with Latin America, which left us, in large measure, with the Middle East as the remaining major area of Canadian concern in trade and foreign policy to be looked at.

We were naturally concerned that nothing in this proposal be interpreted by members of the committee, the Senate, or, for that matter, the Canadian public at large, as being some sort of effort on the part of the committee to conduct a second Camp David. We are not launching upon this particular study on the basis of trying to arrive at a solution to the serious problem that exists between Israel and the Arab states. That is not our objective. Naturally, this topic will be part of our study, but we wish to address ourselves to the overall relationship between Canada and the Middle East from the points of view of trade, diplomatic representation, immigration and other matters involving the countries in that part of the world, countries with which Canada is developing ever more trade and other relations.

The reason for the long list of countries which we have put forward in the motion is that we do not want any doubt to exist in people's minds as to the area involved. Basically, it is the area of the Middle East, but we thought it unfortunate to conduct such a study without including the Moslem countries of North Africa. So, for our own guidance and because we did not want anybody to think that we would be wandering astray, north to Turkey, east to Afghanistan or into Pakistan, we decided to put some geographic perimeters, if I may use that term, on the Middle East by listing the many countries encompassed in that area. It is a study which, I can assure you, the committee will approach on the basis of Canada's broad interests in that area, and not in the narrow context of the Israeli-Arab conflict, which is an ongoing problem.

I do not think there is anything further I can add, unless honourable senators have specific questions.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I have one question. I am not sure whether the list of countries included what are referred to as the Mediterranean countries of North Africa. Morocco and Egypt, I believe, were listed, but are all the countries in North Africa bordering on the Mediterranean Sea included? Perhaps the honourable senator could inform us.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, all those countries are included, or are intended to be included. To repeat, they include Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, Libya and Egypt.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in case there are some members of the Senate who would like to read the list of countries tomorrow in Hansard, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit at three o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, 16th June, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Could we please have an explanation?

Senator Frith: We ask to be authorized to meet during the sitting of the Senate because the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science is making a preliminary examination of Bill C-115, an act to establish a national program for occupational training. A week ago, we had agreed that the Minister would appear before the Committee tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m. This is why we ask to be authorized to meet while the Senate is sitting.

● (2010)

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Was the deputy leader not aware a week ago that normally the Senate is sitting at 3 o'clock on Wednesday afternoons?

Senator Frith: Of course.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, although I suppose the answer to my question must be yes, I wonder whether the deputy leader, in thinking about this particular matter, considered the meeting of the committee chairmen and others that will be held tomorrow afternoon when the Senate rises?

Senator Frith: I thank the honourable Senator Smith for raising that question. I did think of that meeting, to be held tomorrow when the Senate rises. That is one of the reasons I moved this committee meeting to 3 o'clock, the original request having been to meet at 4 o'clock. I have advised Senator Bonnell, the chairman of the relevant committee, of the other meeting. We hope that no conflict will arise.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline have power to sit at 3 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next, 22nd June, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, I am told that this committee had made arrangements for the attendance of witnesses on the afternoon of June 22, not realizing that the Senate would be sitting at the same time. Normally, this permission would not have been required, because the Senate would not be sitting on a Tuesday afternoon. In view of the change in our schedule, however, this request is being made.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE JACK AUSTIN, P.C.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, may I address the question of privilege I addressed in this chamber last Thursday afternoon, to advise you that our invitation to the Parliamentary Press Gallery to participate in a baseball game on the front lawn of Parliament Hill, tomorrow has been declined by the Parliamentary Press Gallery.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Softball, not baseball. You are not in shape for baseball.

Senator Austin: That just shows the problem that exists with syntax.

I very much regret that the Parliamentary Press Gallery will not face our challenge, but I believe we have to accept their explanation that they had a prior engagement to attend a rain-swept garden party to be offered by the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. That is their bonafide reason for not meeting us tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Asselin: They will lose by default.

Senator Austin: We, of course, will seek another opportunity.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We win by default.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

POSSIBLE STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development. Am I correct in understanding that the Minister of Finance indicated in the other place today that he will be making a statement on the state of the economy and, perhaps before Parliament rises for the summer, will give an update on the government's perspective of, or program with regard to, the economic evils besetting the country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is a quick, full, ready and accurate reference with respect to what the Minister of Finance said in the other place today. I do not have with me a copy of their "blues," or however you wish to describe them, but the minister has indicated a number of times that he may be making a statement on the economy before this session either adjourns or prorogues, or whatever else happens to it.

Senator Flynn: Will that statement take the form of a mini-budget, or something of that nature?

Senator Olson: Obviously, the Minister of Finance will have to give those finer shades of interpretation my honourable friend is now seeking, and I am sure my friend realizes that.

Senator Flynn: If the question were put on Senator Phillips' motion calling for a new budget, would the minister intervene in the debate and invite the Senate to vote in favour of that motion?

Senator Olson: No, I do not think he would.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would he intervene at all?

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government. On several occasions, at least twice, the Prime Minister of Canada made a statement addressed, among others, to the Prime Minister of Israel urging him unconditionally to withdraw his troops from Lebanon. Yesterday the Soviet Union sent a similar request to Israel, in practically the same terms as those of the Prime Minister of Canada, warning the Israelis that they must withdraw their troops from Lebanon. We are told that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has apparently made a similar statement.

Can the minister tell us what is now the attitude of the government with respect to that Middle East conflict?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a situation report with respect to Lebanon. It bears today's date, and is from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will read the statement:

We deplore the use of force in Lebanon.

We oppose all acts of terrorism, but we do not believe the present Israeli military activities are justified or that they will provide long-term security for the Israeli people.

We are encouraged to see that the ceasefire between Israel and Syria is holding.

There have, however, in recent hours been some reports that there has been sporadic gunfire.

[Senator Flynn.]

● (2020)

We urge these parties to do everything in their power to maintain this ceasefire.

We were concerned about the breakdown of the ceasefire between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization and the renewed fighting in Southern Beirut and hope that the present calm will prevail.

We continue to support the Security Council resolution of June 6 calling for an immediate ceasefire and unconditional and immediate Israeli withdrawal.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. The Leader of the Government should explain, among other things, how the Canadian government would seem to support both the state of Israel and the Palestinians. Has the government not made up its mind yet? Would it like Israel to withdraw its troops unconditionally without any guarantee?

At the same time does Canada not also condemn the actions of Palestinians abroad, even against the people of Israel? Has a decision been made? Does Canada support Israel or the Palestinians?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Canadian government deplores violence of all kinds. It has condemned terrorism on many occasions and deplores the wanton attacks on civilian populations in Israel and other areas and violence in other forms in the Middle East. That has been the consistent Canadian record. We have used our good offices time and time again to attempt to achieve peace in the Middle East. We have dedicated a great deal of effort and have contributed troops, as honourable senators are aware, to peacekeeping assignments in the Middle East. We are fully in support of those measures which, in the long term, are going to provide security for the people of Israel and other nations in the Middle East.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? When the Leader of the Government speaks of security for Israel and the Middle East, is he saying that he is asking that the boundaries of Israel be guaranteed in return for the withdrawal of their forces from Lebanon? My understanding is that Iraq, Libya, Syria and other countries have pledged themselves to the extermination of Israel; that they have said that they are going to sweep the Israeli people into the sea and so on; and that there still exists a state of war. Is there any guarantee of the integrity of the Israeli borders, if they do withdraw, or is that part of the request?

Senator Perrault: As long as any nation in the Middle East states that its ultimate objective is to destroy or to throw into the sea the Israelis, or any other peoples in the Middle East, then, of course, there will never be peace in the area. I do not want to go beyond the statement I have made this evening on the current situation in Lebanon. Honourable senators asked a broader question relating to Canadian policy with respect to other nations there—

Senator Asselin: It is very important.

Senator Perrault: Of course, it is very important, and I think it would be more appropriate for me to bring to the Senate further statements from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, rather than to extemporize on this subject at this time.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is getting those statements, will he try to determine what the Soviets' interests are in Lebanon, and why they are getting into the act?

Senator Perrault: Obviously, this is a situation where we are not in full possession of the facts. It is difficult to obtain information even about the current situation of Canadians in Lebanon, let alone current information concerning the initiatives and the motives of major nations such as the Soviet Union.

Regarding the damage in Israel, Lebanon and the Middle East, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has provided this information:

The Canadian Government is concerned about the displacement and suffering of the people in Lebanon as a result of the present hostilities.

Canada is prepared to respond, as it has in the past, to appeals from recognized international organizations for emergency humanitarian assistance for all people affected by the fighting.

We have just been notified that the International Committee of the Red Cross has launched an urgent appeal for medical teams to be sent to Lebanon.

That is the kind of intervention on our part that I know all Canadians would like to see in order to help with that great humanitarian work. We are exploring the possibility of supporting this Red Cross request. The Red Cross is expected to launch a major appeal in a matter of days.

● (2025)

That is all the information I have of an official nature from the Secretary of State for External Affairs today. If honourable senators would at some point like to have a debate on the subject of the Middle East and Canada's role in the area, that would be welcome.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is it not a fact that the Canadian government's attitude is exactly the same as that of the Soviet Union on that Middle East Crisis? Is there any difference? As far as I am concerned, I do not see any. Canada, just like the Soviet Union, is asking Israel to withdraw its troops. Is this government's policy identical to that of the Soviet Union on the Middle East crisis?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not accept that Canadian policy with respect to Israel and the Middle East is identical to that of the Soviet Union. I think that is an unfortunate statement by Senator Asselin.

Anyone who has visited Israel and who has talked to the Israeli and the Arab people know that there have been tragic incidents throughout the area for both populations and that Canadians have consistently used their good offices to help all people who are and who have been so adversely affected.

Canada's role has been a peaceful one. We have not armed any of the combatants in that area. Our contribution has been one designed to reduce hostility. Our role has been a humanitarian one, an effort to try to bring about peace and security for all. This Canadian policy has gone beyond any one political party in Canada. This has been a united Canadian position.

When Canadians visit that part of the world, they are the recipients of expressions of gratitude from the people of that area who know the constructive contribution Canadians have made. To suggest that our policy in the area is the same as that of the Soviet Union, I think, is rather reprehensible.

We do not believe that long-term solutions are to be found in one nation occupying the territory of another. That does not mean to say that the inhabitants of certain regions of Israel, who have been under constant attack by the terrorists, did not have a right to ask their government to take some action to preserve their lives and provide security for them.

I speak now only as an individual senator and not on behalf of the government. There may have been considerable provocation which necessitated some kind of action against the continuing terrorism. This is my view. I have visited the area, and I have talked to both Israeli and Arab people. Others have been in the same theatre and have seen what has been going on. Mistakes have been made on both sides.

With regard to the widespread devastation in Lebanon and the extent of the attack, I can only say again that we deplore violence and terrorism from whatever source, and we would like to see the Israeli army withdraw to its own frontiers.

Senator Doody: What is the Canadian government's attitude respecting the Israeli request that an arms-free buffer zone be created in south Lebanon to prevent the kind of shelling and harassment of the Israeli settlements which has occurred over the years? Does the Canadian government support the request that an arms-free buffer zone be created?

Senator Perrault: This interesting proposal has been under discussion. The idea would be to place the territory of Israel beyond the range of missiles and long-range artillery.

To this point, the government has not provided me with information as to its official position with respect to that idea, but it is a very interesting concept.

Senator Doody: For the sake of the record, I would point out that my question related to missiles and artillery being moved out of the range of Israeli settlements rather than the Israeli settlements being moved out of the range of missiles and artillery.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, perhaps it would be very helpful if the antagonists in the area were beyond the range of each other's missiles and artillery.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CURRENT STATUS OF FUND

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have no desire to change the subject, but it is obvious that we shall get little or no information on the international situation, so I shall turn my attention to a matter which is domestic in nature.

● (2030)

I read the other day that the March pay-out from the unemployment insurance fund was the largest in the history of the fund. When I read it I was reminded that on June 2 last I directed a question from my seat here in the Senate to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning unemployment insurance, in response to which he undertook to bring back to the Senate a report on the current status of this fund, including projections for the remainder of 1982. I am not aware that any reply was ever made to that question, and perhaps it is just as well, because when I read about the largest pay-out in history I also read that statistics now show that the unemployment payments in March were $786 million. That is very serious. This figure is up 21 per cent from the figure for February, and up 48 per cent from March of 1981.

The surplus for last year was only $320 million, and considering the depleting effect which a large number of work-sharing programs must have had on the fund, when contributions for 1982 were calculated on the basis of an unemployment rate of 7.6, and not the 10.2 per cent rate that we have now, my question is: In the light of these facts, is the government expecting to have to top up the fund for 1982? If so, to what extent? On the other hand, is it planning to recoup the entire deficit through increased premiums in 1983?

Let me add that I was interested to learn that we are to have the minister before one of the committees of this house shortly, that he is going to deal with matters relating to unemployment, and that we may expect to hear great things from him. I would expect that if the minister is going to give us some hope, it will cost more money than has already been referred to here.

As a further question, therefore, added to the one I have already asked, may I inquire from the minister whether the decisions taken with regard to the fund include provision for the new programs that are to be advanced by the minister?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we recognize and respect the seriousness of the question that has just been posed. I am sure, however, that my honourable friend will understand that announcements of the nature he refers to obviously would be contained, if anywhere, in the statement that the Minister of Finance may make, because certainly unemployment levels, and increases in the amount of money paid out in connection with automatic compensators, including the unemployment insurance fund, are significantly affected by changes in the economy. If an announcement is to be made that the fund may be topped up either by the federal government or by means of other revenue-increasing devices, it would be made by one or the other of the ministers directly involved.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for what he has had to say. I choose only to remind him that all I ask is that we receive an update with regard to what it is proposed to do with the unemployment insurance fund. Such a report was promised to me, and it has not yet been forthcoming.

Some of what I have had to say applies only to circumstances surrounding that update, with the object of giving an indication of what I expect it to contain. I do hope that the question that I asked, will still be answered.

Senator Olson: I understand that.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I was about to congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate for providing a delayed answer to a question I asked on April 27. Rather than offering congratulations, however, I would like to provide the Leader of the Government with an opportunity to correct his reply.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): At what page of Hansard was that reply given?

Senator Nurgitz: The reply dealing with the advertising campaign, can be found at page 4331.

I am suggesting that the reply given by the Leader of the Government implies all-party support for the government's "helping Canada work" advertising campaign. The leader said:

The conducting of such a campaign to heighten awareness of the Department of Employment and Immigration training programs was recommended by an all-party committee of Parliament in its task force report, "Work for Tomorrow."

I am sure most honourable senators have read the entire report, though I myself have not. All I have read are some of the conclusions.

I should like to point out to the Leader of the Government that in chapters 3 and 13 of the report the committee condemned, as insufficiently communicative, existing informational programs. I am suggesting that a billboard with the words, "Helping Canada Work," would in no way be adequate to meet that complaint. Furthermore, in its eight conclusions in chapter 13 on planning, information and forecasting, the committee called for an elaborate program to make previously unaware unemployed Canadians aware of specific job opportunities available. In its 24 recommendations to that end it elaborated upon the need for far more specific programs.

What I would like to point out to the Leader of the Government is, that in recommendation No. 180, on page 124 of the report, it says:

Pamphlets, bulletins, radio, television, cable facilities and community billboards in shopping centres and other heavily populated areas in which the government should publicize job vacancies and career possibilities without regard to any political reasons for which the government may have embarked upon this billboard campaign.

The answer is contrary to the recommendation in that it is general, whereas I asked for specifics. I am sure the leader would like to take this opportunity to withdraw his reply and give it further consideration, having regard to the task force report that he has referred to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to withdraw the reply. I certainly will make inquiries. The fact that a billboard appeared in various provinces across the country does not mean that there were not other aspects to the campaign.

In any case, I understand that Mr. Axworthy will be testifying before a Senate committee tomorrow, and I strongly suggest that honourable senators interested in pursuing this matter with the minister should do so on that occasion. In the meantime, I will make further inquiries in order to find out further details of the program, to make certain that my statement, which appears on page 4331 of Senate Hansard of June 10 is accurate.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

About a year ago, perhaps less, the governments of Canada and Ontario entered into some sort of arrangement for refinancing and stabilizing the finances of Massey-Ferguson Limited. I would like to ask the minister whether that company has made any announcement of suspension or cancellation of dividends payable by it in the year 1982.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The answer is yes. The board of directors of the company announced some two weeks ago—perhaps a little more—on May 27 or 29, that they would not be paying the dividend on preferred shares, including all those that were underwritten by the Government of Canada, and that required a payment, I believe, effective June 15; but companies are required, under certain securities rules, to make those announcements some time in advance of the actual date, and the company did that.

Senator Smith: But if the announcement turns out to be correct, does the cancellation or suspension of payment of dividends make the Government of Canada subject to any financial obligation, and, if so, what is the nature and extent of such obligation, and who is the beneficiary of the obligation?

• (2040)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the financial obligation of the Government of Canada is that if the dividend payments are not paid, then it will be required to acquire $125 million worth of the preferred shares that were issued. I believe the Government of Ontario would acquire $75 million of the same type of shares that are now being held by one or more financial institutions. For the most part I believe they are banks. It is a requirement that we acquire those shares.

Senator Smith: I assume that would make the Government of Canada a shareholder in the company to the extent of the shares it acquires. When is the obligation required to be met if failure to pay dividends takes place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have in front of me the communiqué respecting this matter. If I might have a few seconds, I believe I will be able to provide the answer. I could say in a preliminary way that pursuant to an agreement between Massey-Ferguson and the Government of Canada dated June 15, 1981, entered into with the authority of Parliament under Appropriation Act No. 4, 1980-81, a consequence of that decision by the board of Massey-Ferguson is that the government is contractually obliged to redeem those series D preferred shares which are put to the government. That would be the undertaking. If all series D shares guaranteed by the federal government are redeemed, the cost will be $125 million, plus one monthly dividend payment of approximately $1.5 million. The Government of Canada would then hold approximately 7 per cent of the shares of Massey-Ferguson.

Senator Smith: I have a supplementary question for the minister. Do any plans exist for use to be made by the Government of Canada of those shares when it acquires them?

Senator Olson: I expect that if they could be sold into the market at a reasonable amount, anywhere near their cost, that would probably be done. I am not trying to delude anyone that that is possible. Market conditions are such that it might not be done. We had hoped, when we entered into that agreement, that it would allow for a refinancing package for Massey-Ferguson, much larger than this amount, so that the company could continue its operations, particularly in Canada, because it had reduced substantially its commitments and some of its activities that represented the main problem concerning profit and loss.

I am afraid that the deterioration in the sales prospects for farm machinery and some other equipment manufactured by Massey-Ferguson has not been as high as was projected—and, of course, other farm equipment companies are also experiencing the same difficulty. However, I should emphasize that despite the current situation, it does not automatically follow that Massey-Ferguson will restrict or scale down its operations in Canada. It is well known that it is facing difficulties in the market, but the company will continue its operations and hopefully the slump in sales generally, and farm equipment in particular, will turn around. In the meantime we have participated in a refinancing package that has set the company up so that it has now been operating for about a year from the first indication of a refinancing package, with some support from the two levels of government as an essential part of that refinancing package.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask the minister a further supplementary? He referred to difficulties regarding sales because there was a fall-off in the market for the company's products, particularly farm equipment. How much of that fall-off occurred in Canada and how much outside our borders? I realize that the honourable gentleman will not have any precise figures, but perhaps he can give us an indication.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I cannot be specific about the difference in the situation between Canada and some other countries. However, I can say that the company has met all of its commitments to the government, apart from paying the dividend. For example, it has maintained a permanent employment level in Canada at more than 6,000 and has broadened its Canadian production base, even though temporary layoffs have occurred due to a sharp down-turn in some world markets which has affected all manufacturers. I might also say that Massey-Ferguson, prior to and because of the commitments made at the time, has further rationalized its operation through divestments internationally, some plant closures internationally, and a consolidation of manufacturing operations outside Canada.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The minister will recall that he has frequently lectured those of us on this side of the house, myself included, for not being accurate or for being too long in our questions, or for not asking questions. My point of order is to draw attention to the fact that his last answer was not in any way responsive to any question that I asked him.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sorry if that happened, I shall try to be more perceptive in future.

Hon. David Walker: That's not the first time.

DOME PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the government's policy in support of stumbling corporations. In view of the action and attitude taken by the government with respect to Massey-Ferguson, and also to the Chrysler Corporation, would the minister tell the Senate whether in principle the government is able to consider the current application of Dome Petroleum for some kind of refinancing support from the Government of Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not wish to give an answer one way or the other, for the perfectly obvious reason that it is not my practice to make announcements in response to questions in the Senate concerning those matters about which honourable senators may be curious, or which may be under consideration. However, leaving aside Dome for a moment, I can tell the honourable senator that the government has also been helpful in some other areas when similar difficulties have arisen—for example, with Co-op Implements in western Canada. We assisted substantially in a different way because there were some grants in addition to assistance by way of underwriting to assist that farm machinery manufacturer.

I will be happy to show my honourable friend, if he is not already aware of it, the sort of response that was made in that regard. On the basis of scale, of the size of the operation, I believe the assistance was equally or even more generous than that given to Massey-Ferguson or Chrysler.

Senator Roblin: Then I believe it is fair to take from the minister's remarks the implication that he does not rule out the possibility of the government's coming to the assistance of Dome Petroleum. In fact, I believe he is telling me it is likely that it will.

Therefore, I would ask him a further question. In view of the fact that Dome Petroleum has made an application for assistance to the government in connection with the company's financing problems, can the minister tell the house when a decision as to when any help will be rendered might be expected?

● (2050)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I cannot accept the assumption that an application has been made. Perhaps there have been some discussions, but I have to give the honourable senator an answer that I am sure he expects, that whenever decisions of cabinet are to be announced, such announcements will be made by the minister directly responsible.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would not like the minister to leave me with a false impression. He says that he thinks that an application may have been made.

Senator Olson: You said that an application has been made.

Senator Roblin: I put it to the minister that an application has definitely been made and that requests have been received from Dome for help in this respect. I do not see why the minister fudges the issue. The minister may not be ready to tell us what he is going to do, but I do not think that he should be at all shy in saying that the matter is being considered. I am perfectly positive that it is. I have asked him when he thinks a decision will be forthcoming, but he does not choose to give me an answer, so I will put another question to him.

Will the minister give the Senate the assurance that in order to deal with this particular matter the government will not take advantage of the power to create energy corporations contained in Bill C-105 which is before us at the present time? Really, what I am asking the minister is whether Bill C-105 is being envisaged by the government as the possible machinery or mechanism by which it can render help to Dome Petroleum.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Roblin is trying to make a representation and to get a commitment from me that certain parameters or restraints, or however you want to describe them, will be set around an application that he is sure has been made, although he has asked me whether it has been made.

Hon. Robert Muir: You are lecturing again.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is attempting, I will admit, very cleverly, to get an answer from a different angle, but, I am sorry, I must decline.

Senator Roblin: It is our duty to ask questions, and it is our duty to try to elicit answers from the minister.

Senator Olson: I agree.

Senator Roblin: If he refuses to answer, however, there is not much I can do about it, but I do not think he should criticize me for trying. In view of the fact that he has thrown some doubt on the matter, I ask him to deny that there are conversations going on between the government and Dome with respect to this matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, irrespective of whether I deny, confirm or whatever, my honourable friend knows very well that no minister has the latitude in this government, or had the latitude in any previous government, to discuss across the floor of this chamber what may or may not be going on in cabinet meetings—including the agenda.

Senator Roblin: Of course, I did not ask any such questions, and my honourable friend knows that perfectly well.

Senator Olson: You asked me to deny it.

Senator Roblin: I asked the minister to state the policy of the government and whether it was broad enough to envisage support for Dome Petroleum. That is the substance of my question.

Senator Olson: I understand.

Senator Roblin: But he has been dodging that question, for reasons that escape me. I give him another chance to give us a straightforward answer, for a change.

Senator Muir: It is called "freedom of information".

Senator Olson: I thank the honourable senator for the second, third or fourth chance, but I decline.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

WOMEN FROM METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I draw to your attention the presence, in both the north gallery and the south gallery, of some ladies from Metropolitan Toronto. Some of them are visiting the Parliament Buildings for the first time. Others are now in the gallery in the other place. On behalf of the Senate, may I extend to them a hearty welcome and wish them a pleasant visit to Ottawa?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are a good politician.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Are they from York-Caboto?

RULES OF THE SENATE

AMENDMENT TO RULE 49

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned York-Caboto, and in that connection I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware that on June 9, 1982 Senator Lang rose in his place and spoke on the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, chaired by Senator Molson, and that during his intervention he mentioned my name. That report deals with changes to the rules of the Senate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is this a point of privilege?

Senator Bosa: No, I am asking the leader whether he is aware of this matter.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is aware of everything.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The answer is no.

Senator Bosa: I was not present on that occasion because I was attending a meeting of the Joint Committee on Official Languages.

Senator Lang referred to an amendment I proposed, in December 1979, to rule 49(1)(c) to do away with the necessity for stating the reasons for abstaining when a vote is taken. Now it is not obligatory for a senator to state reasons for abstaining.

At page 4324 of Hansard, Senator Lang is reported as having said:

Honourable senators, this issue has quite a historical background. In speaking today, I am not indirectly but, rather, directly paying a tribute to Senator Bosa. He and I disagree on many points. Of course, I do agree that we should change all our cartographical references from "Cabot" to "Caboto". I believe that would be part of the logical evolution of our country. However, apart from that agreement, most of the time I do not share his views.

It is unfortunate for Senator Lang that he does not share my views on other subjects, but I just want to say that I appreciate the tribute he paid me. As a junior senator—and I say this with a sense of pride—I am glad that honourable senators have accepted my suggestion to amend the rules to make the Senate more efficient when voting on a particular matter. I am just wondering whether the Leader of the Government is aware of this particular fact.

Senator Perrault: I thank the honourable senator for his question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Did you receive notice?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Certainly, that is an Order Paper question.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA— CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We in this chamber, and, in fact, the people of Canada, have been living for some weeks under the shadow of deep concern that the fighting in the Falkland Islands might escalate; indeed, concern that there should be any fighting at all. Now that there is a ceasefire and the fighting has stopped, I wonder if the Leader of the Government thinks it appropriate that the Senate send a message to the Parliament of the United Kingdom saying that we rejoice with them that peace has now been re-established, that we grieve with them over the losses in the battle, and that we support the use of force in defence of lands occupied contrary to the principles of the United Nations.

Hon. Martial Asselin: No, it is too early yet.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the Falkland Islands in the form of a short statement from the government. Of course, if the honourable senator wishes to move a motion, then there is a procedure in place for that.

In any event, honourable senators will be pleased that there finally appears to be a ceasefire in the Falkland Islands and I am sure that all honourable senators are happy with that news. The exact nature of the surrender has still not been confirmed. If, indeed, it is confirmed that all hostilities have ended, the government will consider action in regard to the economic sanctions we have imposed on Argentina, and will make an announcement in due course. I think I can say that all of us are most pleased that the ceasefire has taken place and that the matter has finally been resolved after such a difficult period of time. However a motion on that subject proposed by the Leader of the Government at this particular time would not be in order.

Senator Molson: I was not suggesting that a motion necessarily be made by the Leader of the Government. I merely asked whether the Leader of the Government thought it would be appropriate to send a message on behalf of this house to the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that a resolution relating to this matter may have been moved today in the other place. I suggest that we look at its wording and deal with the subject tomorrow. Honourable senators may wish to adopt similar wording in a Senate resolution.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT GRANTS TO FIRST-TIME HOME PURCHASERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he comment on the recommendation by HUDAC that the government provide $7,500 grants totalling $600 million to stimulate the housing industry, thereby putting more people back to work and providing homes to first-time home buyers who need them so badly. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can answer that question, or refer it to the minister responsible with the suggestion that he look at this very reasonable and excellent suggestion, which would also provide taxes to the three levels of government involved to the tune of some $11,000 per house.

● (2100)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I am not in a position to comment on that subject at the moment.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA— CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I can direct to the Leader of the Government a question supplementary to that of the Honourable Senator Molson. I noticed, in the exchange between the Leader of the Government and Senator Molson, that both the words "ceasefire" and "surrender" were used with reference to what has happened in Argentina. This has moved me to ask whether those words are used interchangeably. What is the proper word to describe what has taken place? Has there, indeed been a surrender?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I quoted the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He stated that there finally appears to be a ceasefire in the Falklands. This appears to be confirmed by late reports today. He said that the exact nature of the surrender has still not been confirmed.

I shall be pleased to bring a further statement to the Senate tomorrow, when more details are available, if that is satisfactory.

OIL EXPLORATION—SAFETY OF MARINE DRILL RIGS— DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, if I may take advantage of the order of business, having come to delayed answers to questions, I would like to draw attention to a question of mine, the answer to which has been delayed for a long while.

On February 16, 1982, as reported at page 3620 of Senate Hansard, I asked a question relating to the tragedy at sea of the sinking of the drilling rig off Newfoundland. My question was:

I wonder, honourable senators, if I might presume upon the good nature of the Leader of the Government to ask another question with regard to jurisdiction. I am not sure of the jurisdiction under which licensing would fall at that particular distance from the coast of Newfoundland. However, if it is within some Canadian licensing jurisdiction, either federal or provincial, would it be possible to tie the licensing requirements to the provision of adequate safety measures in operating a drilling rig?

The answer was:

Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

I wonder if the honourable gentleman is now in a position to respond to the question and enlighten us as to what he discovered as a result of taking it as notice?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Smith for reminding me of this situation. I will find out the stage to which the research has progressed.

THE ECONOMY

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MAINTENANCE SHOPS LAYOFFS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Phillips on May 26 related to the possibility of employment for laid-off CN workers with the Milwaukee Railroad Company.

It should be clear that it is CN's American subsidiary, Grand Trunk Corporation, that has entered into an operating agreement with the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad Company. The letter of intent, mentioned by Senator Phillips, for the purpose of acquiring the railway only applies in three years' time. Consequently, there is no program between CN and the Milwaukee Railroad regarding laid-off employees.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—JURISDICTION OVER OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a fairly long answer in response to questions raised on May 19 by Senators Marshall and Murray related to negotiations on the Newfoundland offshore question. If I may, I will file it with the Hansard reporter in order that it may be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Mid-May discussions between Ministers Lalonde and Marshall did not conclude on a positive note. They resulted in Justice Minister Chrétien's announcement on May 19 that the federal government had filed a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for an early decision on who owns the seabed resources in the Hibernia area off Newfoundland.

In a telex sent to Premier Peckford notifying him of the Supreme Court reference, Prime Minister Trudeau indicated that he deeply regretted this course of action. However, he wrote: "You have insisted that the federal government agree, in advance of serious negotiations, to set the issue of legal ownership aside permanently and commit itself to a framework for resource management that could produce a stalemate, which would not be in anyone's interest."

With regard to the question posed by Senator Murray concerning consultations with the Newfoundland government, the Minister of Justice on March 5, 1982 offered to his provincial counterpart to refer the Newfoundland question directly to the Supreme Court of Canada for an early resolution of the matter. The Newfoundland Attorney General refused.

WESTERN ELECTRICAL GRID—PROPOSED CONTRIBUTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on June 1 by Senator Roblin related to the western electrical grid. The answer is of medium length, but if the honourable senator is satisfied that I file it as though it had been read, I will be happy to do so.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I will be glad to read it.

(The answers follows:)

During the last three years, the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have been studying the construction of an electrical interconnection designed to deliver output from the Limestone Hydro Plant in Manitoba to the other two provinces under a long-term contract. The provinces have also been negotiating a suitable form of contract, which would share the benefits of this interconnection equitably between the three partners. These negotiations have not reached a conclusion.

The Manitoba Minister of Mines and Energy has approached the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources requesting consideration of some form of federal financial support to assist Manitoba with the large financial outlay that would initially be required for the generating station and the Manitoba portion of the transmission facilities.

Mr. Lalonde has indicated that Manitoba's request will be considered sympathetically. It will be necessary to review carefully the studies that have been undertaken and consider the nature of the interprovincial agreement that may be reached. This agreement will determine the revenues available to support the capital investment.

Mr. Lalonde has agreed to meet with the Manitoba Minister of Mines and Energy, Mr. Parasiuk, within the next two weeks for further discussion.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CHANGES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on May 19 by Senator Roblin related to emergency oil reserves.

Honourable senators will know that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been studying the idea of establishing an emergency oil inventory for several years.

While the NEP Update made reference to the initiation of a program to purchase some additional volumes of western Canadian crude oil for storage as a means of alleviating the shut-in capacity in western Canada, the matter of an emergency oil reserve remains under examination.

Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer in response to questions Senator Roblin also asked on May 19 related to shut-in oil and the state of the Alberta production system. This is a long answer, honourable senators, and if Senator Roblin agrees, I will take it as having been read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Conventional light and medium crude oil producibility for the first four months of 1982 was estimated at 149.3 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$, down 10.8 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$ from 1981, reflecting the natural decline in conventional crude oil producibility. Actual output averaged 142.9 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$, leaving 21.3 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$ shut-in due to lack of demand by domestic refiners. This includes 1.8 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$ of Light Saskatchewan Blend.

Heavy crude oil producibility for the same period was 36.8 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$, up 2.1 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$ from last year. This increase reflects higher producer netbacks resulting from the new pricing agreements between the federal and provincial governments (old and new oil prices) and lower provincial royalties. However, as a result of lower refinery demand in both Canada and the U.S., 8.2 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$ of heavy crude oil was shut-in (shut-ins were basically split 50/50 between Alberta Bow River and Saskatchewan Fosterton crudes).

While Syncrude synthetic output was up slightly from last year (up 2.8 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$), Suncor continued to experience technical problems, resulting in output falling substantially (down 2.3 $10^3\text{m}^3/\text{d}$).

Preliminary assessments for May and the forecast for June show a marked decline in crude oil shut-in capacity from the April levels. The extent of shut-in capacity early this year was a matter of considerable concern in the industry of western Canada. The outlook has improved considerably as indicated by the following estimates.

| | April | May | June |
|-------------------------------------|----------------------|------|------|
| | (thousands bbls/day) | | |
| Conventional Light and Medium Crude | 333.3 | 89.5 | 20.2 |
| Heavy Crude | 52.3 | 36.5 | 17.0 |

The program of action, initiated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on April 1, to improve markets for, and increase the production of, western Canadian light and heavy crude oils is being actively implemented. The measures announced at that time included the following:

- Assurance that Canadian heavy crude oil exports to the U.S.A. will continue to be competitively priced by adjusting the export charge as required;
- Applications to the National Energy Board for the export of heavy crude oil for terms of up to one year will be welcome: the policy remains to export heavy crude oil that is surplus to domestic needs;
- Exchanges of light and heavy western Canadian crude oil via the U.S. into eastern Canada, without export charge, will be considered by the National Energy Board;
- The Board will also review its system for allocating light crude oil into eastern Canada and consider separate treatment of crude oils chronically shut-in, such as light Saskatchewan crude; and
- The National Energy Board will also evaluate whether chronically shut-in crude oil, such as the Saskatchewan light sour crude, could be considered surplus to domestic needs and be exported.

The National Energy Program Update, released May 31, contained measures to reduce the problem of shut-in domestic oil over and above the April 1 measures. These new initiatives include: restriction of imported crude oil to term contracts; changes to the method of calculating the Oil Import Compensation Flat Rate to ensure that actual rather than estimated costs of imports are used as a basis for payment of import subsidies; purchase of additional volumes of western Canadian crude for domestic oil storage; and financial support for moving western Canadian crude to eastern Canada via exchanges with U.S. refiners.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have yet another delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Roblin on May 19 related to the possible changes in the NEP which would have an impact upon the tax regime affecting conventional oil in Alberta.

Honourable senators will recall that on May 31, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources released the "National Energy Program: Update 1982", which contained various measures to expedite the achievement of goals of the 1980 NEP New Fiscal Initiatives contained in "NEP II" affecting the conventional oil sector include: a one-year reduction of one percentage point in the effective rate of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax (PGRT); a Small Producer PGRT exemption of $250,000 per company; a one-year suspension of the Incremental Oil Revenue Tax; broadening of the scope of the New Oil Reference Price to cover high cost oil production; and a special price for oil discovered after 1973 and before 1981 to encourage firms which explored aggressively for oil after the 1973 international oil crisis.

That answer is on the record, honourable senators. In addition to it, although I am not going to ask that it be printed as an appendix, either to the answer or to Senate Debates, I have a 12-page detailed technical explanation of a number of those points, and if Senator Roblin would like me to provide him with a copy of it, I will be happy to do so.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some late information from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Lebanese situation. This information, in effect, constitutes replies to questions asked by Senator Macquarrie, Senator Marshall, Senator Stollery and Senator Donahoe on June 10.

Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie asked if there had been any response to the message sent by the Prime Minister to Prime Minister Begin. We have received no response from the State of Israel other than through the actions it has taken in southern Lebanon.

Senator Marshall asked if a similar message had been sent to Syria or the PLO. The answer is that no message was sent to either party.

Senator Marshall also wishes to know Canada's position with regard to the PLO. The Canadian government recognizes that if there is to be a just peace in the Middle East, the legitimate rights and concerns of the Palestinians must be realized. We believe the Palestinians have a right to play a full part in negotiations to determine their future and the right to a homeland within a clearly defined territory, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

The Canadian government does not, however, recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, nor do we regard it as the Palestinians' "sole legitimate representatives." Of course, we acknowledge that it does represent an important element of Palestinian opinion.

We have had contacts with the PLO over time, particularly in Beirut, and have maintained these during the present crises when we called for all parties to end their military activity. Cabinet ministers have not undertaken contacts with the PLO. We have not authorized the opening of any PLO mission or office in Canada.

● (2110)

Senator Stollery asked whether any thought had been given to getting the Canadian embassy staff out of Beirut and away from the fighting. Honourable senators, there is presently a skeletal staff of five people at the embassy. Everyone else has been moved to safety. We are in contact with the ambassador on a daily basis and we are acting on his recommendations in this regard.

Senator Donahoe asked if any criticism had ever been directed by the Government of Canada toward the apparent occupation of Lebanon by Syria. Honourable senators, again the answer is no. The reason for this is that the Syrians were invited there by the Lebanese government which has never asked them to leave.

Finally, Senator Macquarrie wished to know if it was the view of the Canadian government that the PLO was responsible for the tragic shooting of the Israeli ambassador in London. Honourable senators, the Canadian government has no views on where the responsibility should lie. So far as the government is concerned, this is not a Canadian matter but a matter for the police in Great Britain.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 8 Senator Roblin asked a question concerning the government's view of Canadian policy requirements now that the Versailles summit is over.

The Minister of Finance, when appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on May 31, 1982, stated that he would not seek additional borrowing authority until he laid out "in some detail an update of both the economic situation and the fiscal situation."

The government is presently assessing Canadian policy requirements and is trying to find ways, as the Prime Minister stated yesterday in the other place, "to weather the storm better than other countries", which are all presently experiencing considerable economic hardship.

Consequently, honourable senators, and in way of direct reply to Senator Roblin's question, the statement of the Minister of Finance will be brought to the Senate just as soon as it is available. The Prime Minister stated yesterday that the Minister of Finance will make that statement before Parliament adjourns for the summer.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order concerning how long it takes to get answers which could be available in a much shorter time. I have mentioned this before and I realize I am being repetitive, but this is the last time I will raise the matter.

On May 18 I asked a question with regard to a rumoured reduction in the budget of the militia. The Leader of the Government in the Senate replied to my question on June 8, at which time I indicated that the answer had been available on the day after I asked the question. I pointed out that on May 19 the Minister of National Defence had put out a news release which comprised exactly one-half of the answer which the Leader of the Government gave us here and which was attached as an appendix to Debates of the Senate for June 8.

I just want to confirm now that I was correct in saying that the day after I asked the question a news release was published by the Minister of National Defence and that everybody received that, including the Leader of the Government here. I also sent him a copy of that release just a couple of days ago. It matches exactly the answer which appears as an appendix to the Debates of June 8.

My reason for raising the matter now is that I feel that when it comes to being provided with information, the Senate is not being treated with the proper respect. Surely, if the answers are at all available, the Senate should receive them just as quickly as anyone else. Otherwise, is there any point in our putting questions to the Leader of the Government, or asking him to take them as notice? When the answers to questions are available, whoever is responsible for supplying the answers should smarten up and send them to the Senate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that Senator Marshall is not equally commendatory when the government provides answers in a very short period of time, such as in the case of the information about Lebanon brought to the chamber this evening.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: Senator Marshall has stated that the information provided on the subject of the militia was more complete when it was answered in the Senate. That is the point I made the other day. The news release only represented one-half of the information brought by me to the chamber on June 8.

Senator Marshall: The rest was superfluous.

PRIVATE BILL

THE GRAND LODGE OF THE BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA—THIRD READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the third reading of Bill S-27, to amend the act of incorporation of The Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-112, to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of Bill C-112, to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes, I would like to outline the principles involved in this legislation and to comment briefly on the various clauses and provisions contained in the bill in the order in which they appear.

Honourable senators, the former Bill C-93 was divided into Bills C-111 and C-112 in the House of Commons. Bill C-111, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, will, I believe, receive third reading in the other place this evening and Bill C-112 is now before us.

This bill includes all the taxation provisions of Bill C-93, except for clause 7 which prescribes the limits for the tax rates.

Honourable senators, as you will recall, the Government of Canada entered into agreements with Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia last fall about oil and natural gas pricing and the sharing of revenue from these resources. Generally speaking, the bill before us is divided in two parts which ensue from these agreements between the Government of Canada and the said provinces.

The first part also includes three minor technical amendments. As a corollary of the agreement between the government of Canada and the oil producing provinces, I would like to speak briefly about the taxation powers provided by the energy agreements covered by this bill. The first part of the bill amends the Excise Tax Act by making changes to taxes on natural gas and natural gas liquids. The bill also includes minor technical amendments to the federal sales tax. The second part of the bill amends the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act in accordance with the agreements between the government of Canada and the oil producing provinces.

The second part of the bill implements the first ways and means motions relating to the Excise Tax Act which the Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, tabled with his budget of November 12, 1981. The bill sets the rate of the federal sales tax on natural gas at zero for natural gas exports, except for gas produced in Canada lands. This zero rate will apply to the period from October 1, 1981 to December 31, 1986 or until the agreements with the producing provinces expire. The bill also provides for the reimbursement of the tax on ethane exported during this period. Second, the tax rate on Canadian sales of natural gas will be set so that its wholesale price, including the tax and transportation costs to wholesalers in Toronto, will be equal on the average to about 65 per cent of the average price of crude oil purchased by Toronto refineries. Thus, conversion to natural gas will be very strongly promoted and those who are already using natural gas will continue to find it significantly more economical.

On second reading, the House of Commons also amended clause 7, as I have already mentioned. The limits for the rates will therefore be phased in.

The tax rate was set at 42 cents per gigajoule on January 1, 1982, and the rate went up to 63 cents per gigajoule on February 1, 1982. This rate of 63 cents per gigajoule will probably be maintained for the rest of the year. Thus, the tax rate will depend greatly on the blended oil price which itself varies according to international oil prices.

As regards technical changes to the tax system, they are as follows: First, the establishment of a reduced excise tax rate on wines of all sorts containing not more than 1.2 per cent of absolute ethyl alcohol by volume.

Second, small manufacturers must file refund applications to recover the sales tax paid by them on machinery and equipment bought from their manufacturing activities.

Third, an increased penalty for non-payment of sales tax and federal excise is also provided for. The rate will be increased from 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent per month.

Part II of this legislation amends the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act. To that end, the rate of the petroleum and natural gas revenue tax, which, it will be remembered, was introduced by way of the National Energy Program on October 28, 1980, will be increased from 8 per cent to 16 per cent as of January 1st, 1982. There is a 25 per cent resource allowance for those responsible for the payment of provincial royalties or taxes on minerals, on oil and gas production revenues. The result is a change from 8 per cent to 12 per cent, if the difference under the 25 per cent allowance is included.

The legislation also provides an incremental petroleum revenue tax, which will apply to the production of oil discovered before 1981. From January 1982 on, the tax rate is 50 per cent of incremental revenues, after deduction of relevant government royalties. Incremental revenues subject to the tax derive from the fact that the prices of old oil are higher than those established in the National Energy Program announced in 1980. Revenues so taxed will be exempt from income tax. Also, the burden of that tax on wells producing less than 3.18 cubic meters per month will be reduced. Such a reduction, which is also called a readjustment for low productivity wells, will profit significantly to producers in Saskatchewan where a large number of wells fall into that category.

Finally and importantly, I would like to switch over to another subject, to wit the content of the document: "The National Energy Program, Update 1982" made public by the Honourable Marc Lalonde on May 31, 1982. Honourable senators no doubt are well aware of the details. The measures announced are for the short term, realizing the cash flow problems will be excessive with the increase in small businesses indebtedness and the reduced demand for oil products. In particular, the announcement reduced the basic rate on production revenues and provided for special allowance on synthetic oil from tar sands, and for the duration of agreements, a new income tax credit will be introduced with an annual $250,000 ceiling applying to corporate production revenue tax. Finally, no tax on incremental oil revenues will be due where conventional oil will be marketed between June 1, 1982 and May 31, 1983.

Honourable senators, the changes were announced after Bill C-112 had gone through third reading in the other place. The changes from the "1982 update" will be part of a new bill to amend the currently proposed legislation.

Honourable senators, in reviewing the principles of the legislation, if this be of interest to you, given the specific provisions of the bill, I will now address the house in English.

● (2120)

[English]

The first clause is a technical clause increasing from 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent the monthly penalty imposed on defaults.

Clause 2 is also a technical clause.

I draw attention to clause 3 which contains a much more general statement amending subsection 25.1(1) of the act by adding a definition of "offshore area," and also by changing the word "paid" to the word "imposed" in six subsections.

Clause 4 is a more general clause. Also, it is the major policy amendment in Part I. It extends the current rate of tax of forty-two cents per gigajoule on marketplace pipeline gas one month to February 1, 1982, and establishes a rate of sixty-three cents after that date until a new rate is established by the Governor in Council.

● (2130)

Honourable senators, this is the section that sets the zero rate on exports of natural gas with three exceptions. The first exception relates to Canada Lands. The second exception refers to situations where we burn American gas for certain convenient reasons, and it is treated as Canadian gas. Senator Roblin has posed questions with regard to the rather unusual situation in Saskatchewan where this has occurred. The third exception relates to the looping of the TransCanada pipeline and the use of gas to drive the gas through the pipeline. That is also treated as Canadian gas. Clause 4 and its subclauses provide for the zero rate.

Clause 5 provides for the rates on ethane, propane and butanes which are equal in heat content terms. I mentioned that principle, generally, in the total raison at the outset of my remarks.

Clause 7 increases from 1 to 1½ per cent the monthly penalty imposed on defaults of payment. Clause 7 sets conditions on regulations which set the tax rates on gas and liquids. Honourable senators, this is relevant to the comments I made during my opening remarks with reference to the statement of May 31. Some of the changes announced in the May 31 statement, which will result in a lowering of tax, can be implemented by regulation. I would point out that, although this will apply to many of those changes, it will not apply to all.

Clauses 8 and 9 are technical amendments.

Clause 10, again, might be circled as more of a general statement providing for repayment of gas tax on exports of tax-paid marketable pipeline gas or ethane.

Clauses 11 and 12 are consequential amendments resulting from other amendments.

Clause 13 is a technical amendment, as is clause 14.

Clause 15 is the enactment clause for the provisions in Part I amending the excise tax.

Moving to Part II, clause 16, although long, is, in essence, to introduce a series of new definitions many of which are quite important to the system and are rather fully set out.

Clause 17 introduces a new tax base under Division I of the act. That is an important expression with which we have become somewhat familiar as a result of the provisions relating to the taxable incremental oil revenue.

Clause 18 provides definitions of petroleum and gas production revenues. This is important because it is on those petroleum and gas production revenues that the PGRT is levied.

Clause 19 introduces a new section into the act providing for the determination of taxable incremental oil revenue.

Clause 20 sets out the rates of tax on production revenue and subclause 20(2) provides for what is generally referred to as the "straddle year provision."

Clause 21 deals with section 85 of the act relating to the filing of tax returns. This clause simply provides the obligation to include a calculation of taxable incremental oil revenue.

Clause 22 deals with section 87 of the act.

The remainder of the clauses, honourable senators, are not all either technical or consequential, but are corollaries to the earlier clauses.

I would ask honourable senators to consider the principles of this bill, which is an important part of the National Energy Program. Although it is entitled, "An Act to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes," it is quite clear from the remarks I have made that it very definitely deals with the question of energy, with gas exports, and with gas and petroleum tax.

I commend this bill to honourable senators on second reading. I believe it is already the subject of pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not believe it is.

Senator Frith: When I asked Senator Hayden, he said that the committee had started its pre-study of the bill, but that some problem had arisen with regard to a quorum in the middle of the meeting. For that reason I thought the matter was before that committee.

In any event, this bill will certainly require study by the committee. If honourable senators agree to second reading of the bill, I will move that it be referred to committee for study.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Would the deputy leader permit a couple of questions to which, I readily admit, I might find the answers by searching through previous legislation or the dictionary? However, it seems to me that it might be more convenient if the honourable gentleman can answer them now, if he would not mind so doing.

The first question relates to a certain expression found first, as far as this bill is concerned, in clause 4 on page 4 dealing with the rate of tax which shall be imposed. I wonder if the honourable gentleman can tell us exactly what a "gigajoule" is.

Senator Frith: I cannot, honourable senators. I apologize for that because I had intended to ask exactly what it meant. I know it is a measure of volume, but I cannot give a comparison with reference to cubic feet or anything of that sort. I will try to bring that information to the chamber tomorrow.

Senator Smith: I may also be able to find the answer to my next question by searching in the law reports. I understand that in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance in November 1981 he said words to the effect that there will be no export tax on natural gas, followed by words to the effect that there will be a tax on natural gas sold to citizens of the United States.

I understand that there was some legal action commenced by or on behalf of the Province of Alberta with reference to this question of a zero rate export tax and tax on gas sold to

United States customers. Can the deputy leader tell us at what stage that litigation is? I believe the matter eventually went to the Supreme Court of Canada after a unanimous decision by the Supreme Court of Alberta to the effect that it was not constitutional to impose a tax on U.S. customers.

Senator Frith: I recall the case referred to by Senator Smith. I do not have information on this as part of the preparation of my speech on second reading. I will try to have that information for tomorrow so that honourable senators wishing to participate in the debate will have that information before them.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL CONSUMPTION STANDARDS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 9, debate on the motion of Senator Riel for the second reading of Bill C-107, respecting motor vehicle fuel consumption standards.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is not exactly prime time in this chamber since it is almost time for the beginning of The Journal on CBC television. Such competition is hard to beat.

I would begin by thanking and congratulating Senator Riel for his lucid and helpful explanation of this measure; it was very useful to us all.

● (2140)

Senator Bosa used an expression tonight which recalls that I owe a debt of gratitude to my leader, Senator Flynn. Senator Bosa referred to himself as a junior senator. I am much, much junior to Senator Bosa, so I am grateful to Senator Flynn who on the last sitting day mentioned the fact that I and three others in this chamber have been around for a quarter of a century; so that while I am a Johnny-come-lately here, I was somewhere else not far away while those here gathered their wisdom. Of course, there were people, like Senator McIlraith, who were there long ahead of me.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: It was a good place.

Senator Macquarrie: It was a good place. I think this is a little better, but that is just a remark made in the quiet of Tuesday evening in the companionship of my honourable colleagues.

Being aware of the time I will do my best to make a mini-speech. Perhaps there is more to it than that, because in terms of effectiveness I think the bill is a mini-bill.

These are sombre and troubled times. Tom Payne could well say today that these are times that try men's souls. Quite frankly I do not derive any great pleasure from participating in the discussion of legislative measures relating to our faltering economy, because basically I try to be a cheerful man, however hard it may be to be cheerful in such a milieu, and all the more so when one has to zero in on this kind of legislation, since I am convinced that among the greatest contributors to that faltering of the economy are our government's foibles and fumbles in the energy field that are demonstrated every day. These have been discussed by my colleagues; therefore, I do not have to recite them, and go from Alsands to whatever other things seem to be even worse, Alsands being but one in a string of deep disappointments.

Only a matter of hours ago I read that another setback has taken place, in that we have been disappointed with regard to the expected sale of a Candu to Mexico. There is therefore not very much, honourable senators, to cheer a country which has a government whose pursuit and execution of policies has caused the world around us to abandon faith in the conduct of the Canadian economy.

I have been thinking lately of the last couple of decades. It is just about 20 years ago that the Diefenbaker government was repudiated, lost votes, and was scorned for a 92½ cent dollar. Today what was it? I believe it was 78.22 cents. If anything has happened to the Canadian people in a couple of decades, it is that they have surely learned to endure a great deal, in view of the fact that they would not tolerate a 7 cent difference in those days. What we would like now is to have some of those 92½ cent dollars, if we go to the United States, and have them negotiable. They would be really precious items today.

In all this gloom, how do we appraise Bill C-107? Of it the minister has said that it is just as important as all of the others in the National Energy Program, and perhaps more so. But it is important? Is it necessary?

Looking at the minister's remarks, we might say that it is unimportant and, indeed, unnecessary. I too have the red book, which I think I heard Senator Doody refer to as being the thoughts of "Chairman Marc". At page 51 the minister is reported as saying:

The government has decided that the program will remain voluntary unless companies fail to co-operate.

So as to hammer the point home, the authority to set standards and impose penalties is contained in the act. But the government does not intend that these provisions should be proclaimed. Just having written these sections into the law we hope will be enough to accomplish our goals.

The parliamentary secretary, speaking, I presume, for the government, went on to say that the performance of industry under the voluntary program provides further evidence of success, that the targets for fuel consumption performance have not only been met but have been exceeded to date, and that the expectation is that this trend will continue. He said the willingness and expressed commitment of industry to co-operate with us makes a good case for retaining the voluntary nature of the program.

A humble logician would ask what in the name of heaven would be the necessity of going on further, then. If everything is working well, what is the requirement for quite a substantial chunk of legislation? If everything is good, if everything is hunky-dory, it might recommend itself to wise and thoughtful people to leave well enough alone.

It might then be expected that if everything is fine, and not much is needed, we could pick up this bill and find that it is a very simple piece of legislation. It is, however, not exactly a gentle augmentation of something that is already working well. It is not exactly what they referred to as enhanced voluntarism; indeed, it is a little more than that. What strikes me about this measure is that a situation that is alleged to be totally satisfactory has produced legislation which will be, if enacted, Draconian. Bill C-107 is a massive bureaucratic web, involving the creation of all kinds of inspectors and record-keepers. A veritable empire will be built upon this bill. We will have a vast network of people checking on what is taking place in a situation which is already well in hand. There is something that is much more dangerous, however, than a bureaucratic network. I am not nearly as afraid of bureaucrats as I am of autocrats, and it is for such people that this bill creates a hey-day. It exalts ministerial authority. It adds dangerous powers.

This is a long bill, and I refer to two clauses only. Clause 3 says:

3. The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, make regulations prescribing, for the purposes of section 11, a fuel consumption standard for any prescribed class of motor vehicle for any year.

This is another of these omnibus grants of regulatory power. It is another thrust of unseen sovereignty, a most dangerous thing that Lord Hewart talked about years ago: the new despotism. We have lived to see the new despotism get old.

Far more dangerous than clause 3, however, is clause 37. This is a clause that should be thrown out, should be tossed out, should be discarded, should be deleted, should be defeated. It is one, however, that gives to the Senate of Canada an opportunity to show itself as the guardian of our people. It reads as follows:

37. The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister, make regulations

(a) prescribing anything that is by this Act to be prescribed;—

That is almost authority to turn day into night and the end into the beginning.

(b) respecting such other matters or things as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

No minister should have that kind of power in any parliamentary democracy, and certainly not in ours. Please note that these two provisions are in a bill which arises from the situation which is alleged by the minister to be quite hunky-dory.

I would say that in this time of stress and strain, where everything that the minister seems to put his hand to makes him a King Midas in reverse, it would be better to let this piece of legislation go, and to make a serious effort instead to find alternative energy sources in this country.

● (2150)

I underline the word "serious" because I do not believe that efforts have been made. I am no expert on this, but I, in my small province, have had some experience to demonstrate this. I well recall a few years ago when an enterprising young man got into the business—a very important one in the maritimes—of wind-driven energy. He was doing a fine job. He had his farm electrified by windmobile. He was on the way to making a success of helping both himself and our energy-short province, but month after month and year after year of discussion with government officials could not persuade them to allow that man to import an essential part of his mechanism, namely, the motor. They said "No, no, no; you can buy that in Canada, and so the tariff is on". He could not buy it in Canada, but they could not be persuaded to invoke that as a case of "Class and kind not made in Canada." In other words, while one government department was saying, "We must find an alternative," other departments could not care less.

I have another example. The other day I read my check list from what we used to call the Queen's Printer—every senator gets it—and I saw there one publication called Switching to Electricity: Canada Oil Substitution Program a Part of the National Energy Program. I hope that none of my people in Prince Edward Island read that and take it seriously. If they switch from oil to electricity it will not be a very good move, considering what they pay—and we are not the only ones who are in that situation.

Finally, I listened the other night to the views expressed on the mega-projects—those that were not there, those that will never be, and those that might be. I heard my colleague, Senator Donahoe, ask about the Guysborough Railroad. There was to be a deferred answer to that. I guess the train was late, because I do not believe the senator ever received an answer. I thought of some mega-projects in the area, and I remembered so well, when I was a member of the Transport Committee of the House of Commons, when we were in Prince Edward Island, listening to people there referring to the value of the causeway, which had energy saving aspects as well as many important transportation ones; and before the committee got back to Ottawa, let alone compiled its report, the Prime Minister stood up and said, "That won't be built". So the committee did not go back to Prince Edward Island on that question.

Even more impressive, that even an amateur can see, is the Chignecto project. We have always talked and been frightened by these non-renewable energy resources, but tidal power is as permanent as life itself. So long as the earth and the sun and the moon endure, there will be the power; and down in Fundy it's a source that will challenge the world with its tremendous capacity and force. Some day we know it will have to be built. Montesquieu said that to govern is to foresee. Cannot we sometimes do something before we are forced to do it?

Those are the kind of suggestions that I would favour rather than sticking yet another bill sticker on the poor motorist's windshield, getting a few more reports, throwing another number at him, as if social security and all the rest of it was not enough. That is bureaucratic nonsense. If it were effective it would be unhelpful, and it is likely to be unhelpful and ineffective. This is one of the worst pieces of legislation we have had before us, and I hope it will be the great exercise of this noble body to cast it into the great beyond where it belongs.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL DETERMINATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. D. G. Steuart moved the second reading of Bill C-104, respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I would cut my speech much shorter, but if I do then the people who wrote the speech would probably crucify me. Twenty years ago I was a member of the Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan, and if anyone had suggested that one day I would sponsor a bill such as Bill C-104, I would not have believed them. I was convinced at that time that the only thing wrong with American investment was that we did not have enough of it. I am still convinced that we need outside capital, but that also we need more control of some of our basic industries.

In Saskatchewan at that time we had tried to interest Canadian capital to come into the province to help us develop our resources, and we were largely ignored. We turned to the United States, and they came to our province and developed our timber, potash and oil resources. It was, in fact, a mixed blessing. This largely foreign investment produced badly needed jobs and tax revenues, and while markets were strong we all prospered. A few years later a down-turn in world demand for our resources exposed the other side of the foreign investment coin. To a very large extent we lost control of our own resources. I will briefly outline what happened to the Saskatchewan potash industry, in order to illustrate my point, although the same thing happened in the case of other resources.

Many of our potash mines were American-owned. Those corporations had mines in the United States as well as in Saskatchewan. When the demand for potash fell off, they tended to keep production in their U.S. mines high and reduce output in their Canadian mines. In fact, the American companies exported much of their unemployment and recession to Saskatchewan.

To combat that situation, we in the provincial government at that time introduced legislation pro-rationing the available potash markets among all of the mines in order to maintain employment and protect our economy. We were told by the United States corporations that this was against the American anti-trust laws, and they refused to participate. It was only when we threatened to close them down that they apparently co-operated—I say “apparently” because we never really knew how many potash orders that should have come to Saskatchewan were diverted to the United States.

The U.S. Department of Justice did, in fact, lay anti-trust charges against some of the mines and actually tried to involve Saskatchewan government officials, none of whom, of course, appeared at the trials.

When the NDP came to power in 1971, their solution was to buy out some of the foreign-owned potash mines and in that way attempt to control the industry. I did not then, and I do not now, agree with that solution, because I feared that a cure might prove to be worse than the disease. I am not a great believer in the government's being in business—any government or any business—but I recognize that sometimes it is inevitable and possibly even necessary. However, I believe there is another way to control our basic industries, and that is to encourage Canadian individuals and companies to invest in and to own as much Canadian industry as is practical.

That is what Bill C-104 endeavours to do. It endeavours to encourage, and that is why I support it and urge passage of the bill through the Senate. The principle of Bill C-104 is simply to help achieve energy security and encourage a greater degree of Canadian ownership and control of the vital oil and gas industry. The principle is simple, although the bill itself is complex. However, it has been under pre-study, and I hope that we will send it to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further study in detail, where, I am told, the minister and his officials will be present to assist the committee in its work.

• (2200)

Hon. G. I. Smith: Or confuse them.

Senator Steuart: Bill C-104 deals with petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and amendments to the Foreign Investment Review Act. This bill is an integral part of the National Energy Program, the goals of which are energy security and opportunities for Canadians to share fairly in the development and benefits of their energy resources. The proposed legislation enables the federal government to encourage the growth of Canadian owned and Canadian controlled firms in Canada's oil and gas industry.

Under this proposed legislation, almost $2 billion in cash incentives will be made available to the oil and gas industry to be applied against exploration and development expenses incurred between January 1, 1981 and the end of the 1982 fiscal year alone. Similar incentives will continue to be available under the Petroleum Incentives Program (PIP).

Bill C-104 consists of three parts. Part I, entitled the “Petroleum Incentives Program Act,” provides for making incentives available in respect of exploration or development expenses incurred. The amount of the incentive varies with the Canadian ownership rate of the recipient. Part II, entitled the “Canadian Ownership Rate and Control Determination Act,” provides a means for determining Canadian ownership rate and control status and for granting a certificate to that effect. This certificate will be used to demonstrate entitlement to a certain level in the Petroleum Incentives Program and to demonstrate the level of Canadian ownership required to obtain a production licence under the Canada Oil and Gas Act. The legislation as a whole ensures that maximum incentives go to Canadian-owned and controlled participants in oil and gas exploration and development. This will encourage Canadian participation in the energy sector and thus assist in achieving an overall level of Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industry of 50 per cent by 1990. Part III of the bill amends, in a technical way, two provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

I will now deal in more detail with the provisions of Parts I and II. Part I, entitled the “Petroleum Incentives Program Act,” provides cash incentives to eligible persons. “Persons” in the act refers to individuals, companies or other entities engaged in the oil and gas industry who incur eligible exploration and development expenditures. Without the Petroleum Incentives Program, the major incentives available for exploration and development are delivered through the income tax system. Under this tax-based incentive system, only a person with a taxable income is able to make immediate use of these incentives. Therefore, this system unintentionally discriminated against the small, new investor with no taxable income. However, by virtue of the Petroleum Incentives Program, a system of direct incentives will be made available to an explorer and developer of oil and gas resources in Canada regardless of its tax position.

Generally, as outlined in the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the entitlement to an incentive will be dependent on the person satisfying the following three conditions: one, the applicant must be a qualified person; two, the applicant must own a prescribed interest; and, three, the applicant must have incurred an eligible cost or expense. The percentage of an incentive will depend on some or all of the following factors: the Canadian ownership rate of the applicant; the control status of the applicant; and the type, location and year of the expenditure.

Part I provides for two types of incentives; namely, the crown share incentive, and other than the crown share incentive, or “higher level” incentives. The crown share is an interest retained by the Crown in respect of our production licence issued under the Canada Oil and Gas Act which was passed by the Senate on December 18, 1981. The crown share incentive amounts to 25 per cent of any eligible exploration expenditures incurred on Canada lands. Entitlement to this incentive does not depend on the Canadian ownership rate or the control status of the applicant. The crown share incentive is intended to encourage and assist the exploration effort in Canada lands while contributing towards a share of such expenditures commensurate with the government's retained interest in the Canada lands.

The "higher level" incentives consist of three additional levels of incentives, again representing a percentage of the eligible exploration or development expenditures or eligible asset costs incurred by an applicant. Entitlement to this incentive is dependent on the applicant being Canadian controlled and having a minimum Canadian ownership rate of 50 per cent. The incentive levels, as a percentage of eligible expenditures, increase as the Canadian ownership rate of the applicant increases. In the case of the highest level, the incentives can be as high as 35 per cent of eligible exploration expenses on provincial lands and as high as 80 per cent of eligible exploration expenses on Canada lands.

Part II of the bill provides the framework for the rules for determining Canadian ownership rates and incorporates, by reference, the provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act regarding identification of non-eligible persons as a basis for determining a person's control status. The Foreign Investment Review Act rules involve considerations of control in fact when assessing the non-eligible person status of corporations. The FIRA rules are extended to partnerships and trusts under Part II. The Canadian ownership rate determination rules are primarily set out in proposed regulations. In the case of an entity, such as a corporation, trust or partnership, the Canadian ownership rate is based on the Canadian ownership rate of the shareholders, beneficiaries, or partners. Since these may themselves be entities, a further similar calculation may be necessary as well. It may be necessary to look behind nominees or owners of interest in entities to establish where real beneficial ownership resides.

Bill C-104 has been considered by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Energy Legislation. A number of witnesses appeared before the committee to make submissions on the bill, including the Canadian Petroleum Association, The Canadian Bar Association, The Consumers' Association of Canada, and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Many individual companies, large and small, also appeared. One issue raised by witnesses and the members of the committee was that there was no mechanism established within the bill by which an appeal could be made regarding an incentive or ownership decision. During the report stage of Bill C-104 in the other place, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources introduced an amendment whereby the determination of Canadian ownership rate under various sections was made specifically subject to judicial review under section 28 of the Federal Court Act. This amendment was adopted unanimously by the other place.

Several other amendments were adopted at the committee stage. While most of these amendments were technical, one amendment to Part II of the bill is worth noting. This amendment is intended to allow persons who determined their Canadian ownership rate and control status on the basis of the draft forms and regulations published on March 10, 1982 to rely on the provisions in those drafts for their applications under the act. This prevents any unfairness where applicants for a Canadian ownership rate and control status determination have gone to considerable trouble and expense to determine their Canadian ownership rate under the published draft rules, only to be faced with the possibility of extensive revision and recalculation under the rules set out in the act as proclaimed in force and the regulations as promulgated.

Another issue raised in committee was that the provisions of the bill are too complex. There are, however, good reasons for this complexity. In the case of the Petroleum Incentives Program Act a key consideration has been the recognition that the benefits conferred by the program on Canadians could in a variety of ways be transferred to non-Canadians. This has led to the adoption of rules to reduce such transfers to a minimum.

● (2220)

As for the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, it is intended to measure real beneficial ownership. Sometimes this measurement can be a relatively simple process, while in other cases it is more difficult because of the nature of the entity being measured. The system of rules for the measurement of Canadian ownership is designed to apply to individuals, to private and public corporations and to partnerships and many other investment vehicles such as trusts and insurance companies. The equity structure of each of these types of entities is extremely varied and the Canadian ownership rate rules must parallel that variety to be effective.

The minister announced in the other place that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will keep in close touch with the industry to review the provisions of this bill for any changes that may be required. Any such changes will be considered within the context of the integrity of the program.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to recommend this bill to the Senate as it will be instrumental in enabling Canada to resolve many of its present and future energy problems. If this bill passes second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Charbonneau, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION RE ALLOCATION OF SEAT NO. 15 TO SENATOR MANNING WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

[Senator Steuart.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That the Honourable Senator Manning, P.C., be asked by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition to occupy Seat Number 15 in the front row of the Chamber.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, Order No. 6 concerns a motion I made on June 10 last. I now ask leave of the Senate, under the authority of rule 23, to withdraw this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this motion be now withdrawn?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why does Senator Molson wish to withdraw this motion?

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I made this motion under rule 46(s), which says that no notice is required for a motion that is uncontentious. It now appears that when the motion was made it was, in fact, contentious. I believe it should be withdrawn. I do not know whether my seconder, the Honourable Senator McIlraith, has anything to say on the matter, but that is my view.

Senator Flynn: Senator Molson says that the motion appears to be contentious. I don't see that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Not here.

Senator Flynn: I don't see that, unless the fact that the order stands in the name of Senator Frith makes it contentious. Are we to assume Senator Frith's inaction is to be interpreted as opposition to the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the debate will show that this motion, as a way of dealing with seat changes in the Senate chamber, is, in our view, worthy of further study, and in that sense it is contentious, yes.

Senator Flynn: Are you still studying the matter? I thought it would have been simpler to agree to the motion. So far as we are concerned, we would agree to it readily, even if it is not provided for in the rules. We would certainly not lose any sleep over the irregularity of the procedure.

Senator Frith: I was not thinking in terms of regularity or irregularity. The debate will show that as well. I am simply saying, in response to the observation made by Senator Molson, that the proposal is apparently contentious in the sense that it does not receive unanimous approval. In that sense Senator Molson is correct.

Senator Flynn: It is not receiving unanimous approval, meaning that you, for one, are opposed to it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this motion be now withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn and Order discharged.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on 10th February, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Lafond).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, you will recall that Senator Lafond suggested that perhaps Senator Perrault would have something to say about this report, either on behalf of the Minister of National Defence or on behalf of the government. I believe that Senator Perrault does, indeed, have something to say on this order and, therefore, I ask that it stand until next week in Senator Perrault's name.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 16, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATION TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That this House congratulates Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

He said: Honourable senators, this resolution was passed unanimously yesterday by the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before giving my consent to this motion, I would like to examine it more closely, and I may wish to make a few comments before the Senate decides on the motion in question. I am not prepared to give my consent to having the motion adopted today. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-111, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

ENERGY LEGISLATION—LEGALITY OF TAX COLLECTION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which arises from a news item I read this morning in which a Liberal member of the Ontario Legislature was reported to have stated that certain taxes levied in the last Ontario budget contravene the Charter of Rights in that they provide a penalty for non-payment. The Charter of Rights prohibits such penalty until an act has been passed.

I do not believe the energy bills have yet been passed by Parliament. Bills C-103, C-104, C-106, C-107, C-108 and C-112 all contain penalty clauses which, according to information I have received, is the important point.

Would the Leader of the Government consult with the law officers to see if the taxes that have already been levied and collected under those bills were collected legally, or would he consider referring the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, as he did with the claim of Newfoundland for offshore rights?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not read the news item quoted by the honourable senator. If he has a transcript of the remarks alleged to have been made by a Liberal member of the Ontario Legislature, I shall be pleased to have a copy. Questions raised in the report will be discussed with officials of the Department of Justice, should there be any reason to pursue the matter.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BASIC RATE OF PENSION—AGING VETERANS PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which he will no doubt take as notice. My question concerns the speech made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs at the Dominion Command convention of the Royal Canadian Legion. The minister again repeated the desire of the government to enshrine the basic rate of pension, so that year after year veterans will not have to catch up in equating their pensions with the average of the five lowest categories in the Public Service.

Would the Leader of the Government ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs when this legislation will be brought forward. It would involve only a simple piece of legislation, which, no doubt, could be passed by both houses within hours, and one of the remaining anomalies in the Veterans Affairs Charter could be rectified to the benefit of veterans.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that information will be brought to the Senate as soon as a date has been set for the introduction of a bill.

Senator Marshall: As soon as a date has been set? That could be in 1996. Would the Leader of the Government obtain confirmation from the minister that he would like to bring forward legislation at an early date. I do not accept "when a date has been set" as being a proper answer.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no firm date that I am in a position to communicate to the Senate at this time. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has consistently expressed and demonstrated his concern for the welfare of Canadian veterans. Senator Marshall's question and his observations will be brought to the attention of the minister.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, though I can tell the Leader of the Government that the Aging Veterans Program is an excellent one, it must be brought ahead quicker so that more veterans can take advantage of it. At the present moment, only those with disability pensions are eligible to apply for benefits under the program. The minister indicated in his speech to the Canadian Legion that by 1996 only 395,000 veterans would be left. In view of the fact that the average age of World War II veterans is now around 63 or 64, it is imperative, especially with the closing of the last remaining veterans' hospitals, that this Aging Veterans Program be put into effect sooner. Would the minister obtain some information and bring me an update on that matter?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question? As every day under the minister and his colleagues goes by, the Canadian dollar is setting new records as it falls to new lows. My question is based on the statement by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister that the dollar will be free to float below 80 cents. Does this mean that the Bank of Canada will cease intervening in the money market to support the level of the dollar?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it has been stated over and over again that the Bank of Canada intervenes only to modify some of the extreme fluctuations that occur in the value of the dollar.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean that it will sink slowly?

Senator Olson: The real value of the Canadian dollar, or the amount at which it is trading on the international exchange, will be set by the market, with some modest intervention to offset the extremes, as I have just mentioned.

Senator Flynn: What do you call an extreme?

Senator Murray: We shall see, when the figures on the foreign exchange reserves come out in due course, just how modest the intervention by the Bank of Canada has been. In light of the minister's statement, why does the government need $750 million, which it is trying to borrow—as I observe, with some difficulty—on the European market?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not accept the statement in the last part of that question, that it is "with some difficulty". The honourable senator knows that it is necessary from time to time to demonstrate to many traders that there is a great deal of strength in the Canadian monetary system, along with the determination that it is not easy for them to have a run on the Canadian dollar in order to make a profit. As I pointed out, there has been some fluctuation, and in the past few days that fluctuation has been slightly more down than up.

However, Canada is not alone in this situation. As a matter of fact, the decline in the Canadian dollar in recent days has occurred against the background of a very strong U.S. dollar in the international market, and against the U.S. dollar all major international currencies have come under some downward pressure. If my honourable friend would like the figures, it is not really difficult to provide them. For example, during the past week the Canadian dollar declined against the United States dollar by 1.4 cents, and over the past two weeks by 2.1 cents, while over that same two-week period the Japanese yen has declined by 2.9 per cent.

● (1410)

In the same period the Deutschmark declined 3.3 per cent, or 50 per cent more than did the Canadian dollar; the Swiss franc declined 3.9 per cent; the French franc declined 9.2 per cent; the Italian lira declined 4.6 per cent.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about the American dollar?

Senator Olson: The pound sterling declined 1.8 per cent; the Belgian franc declined 4.1 per cent; and the Dutch guilder declined 2.8 per cent.

Senator Asselin: The American dollar!

Senator Olson: Therefore, there is only one major currency in the international world, that being the U.K. pound, that declined less in the past two weeks than did the Canadian dollar against the U.S. dollar.

As I pointed out, there are a number of obvious reasons for that, and I would be glad to give you our explanation.

As I said, the Canadian dollar has performed in those markets very strongly in the past few days. Against all currencies, the Canadian dollar has stood up to the pressure better than all but one.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it would have been helpful had the minister—

Senator Perrault: You should be proud of that instead of knocking it.

Senator Roblin: —pointed out to the Senate that 70 per cent of our business is done with the United States and, therefore, it is natural that we should be particularly concerned about the Canadian dollar's relationship to the American dollar.

My question is to ask the minister to bring to the Chamber trade-related changes in values of these various currencies. In other words, the terms of trade as related to the volume of business we do in these other currencies as compared to the American dollar.

I have seen some figures in that respect and they indicate that we really have nothing to boast about. So, I ask the minister if he would bring in the trade-related comparison that takes cognizance of the fact that 70 per cent of our business is done in the American dollar arena.

Senator Olson: Yes, I would be glad to bring that information to the chamber, as well as other information that at least calls into question the premise that was running through my honourable friend's question. For example, on merchandise trade, our surplus has gone up rather significantly in the first quarter of 1982 vis-à-vis 1981. Indeed, even on a balance of national accounts basis we are doing better than we did a year ago, but particularly in the trade sector.

I may be even more specific than that and bring information to this chamber on the manufacturing sector. As you pointed out, our trade is done largely with the United States. Our position relative to the first quarter of one year ago has, in fact, improved over that of other countries.

Senator Roblin: I am sure that, with his departmental responsibilities, the minister will be the last one to declare himself satisfied with that change.

I certainly hope that his forecast is borne out, because we will need all we can get if our balance of payments as a whole is to be favourable toward Canada. So, if he can bring in figures that indicate we are making some progress along some lines, I think we would all be pleased. I encourage him to do so.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTERNATIONAL MARKETING NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I now wish to turn my attention to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board and tell him that he looks unchanged from the last time I saw him. He has been travelling since then, and we are glad to see him back.

On June 14 of this year, the minister was quoted as saying that there would be negotiations conducted among the world's major wheat producers to stabilize the market, and that that meeting would be at the officials level, with a ministerial meeting a real possibility this fall.

I ask the minister if he has been correctly quoted.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think the quotation is probably fairly strong.

The officials from the major grain exporting countries held a meeting in Ottawa a few weeks ago. Following that meeting, they issued a press statement in which they said that they hoped to be able to have another meeting at the officials level later this year. I had the opportunity to meet with Mr. Block, the United States Secretary of Agriculture when he was in Ottawa a couple of weeks ago. He expressed the hope that there could be a meeting at the ministerial level in due course to discuss the international wheat situation and the policies of various countries involved in the export of grain, with the objective of endeavouring to iron out some of the ups and downs in the international market and bringing greater returns to the grain producers. I think that is an accurate statement about the situation with regard to possible or prospective meetings.

• (1415)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I hope that if the minister does attend such a meeting he does so with his guard up, because if he goes to an international meeting that is going to manage the grain trade in terms of price, he is going to find out very soon that they want to manage it in terms of supply. That means that Canada would be asked to consider supply management in terms of the provision of grain for the international market.

I am sure the minister is aware of the dangers that such a policy presents for us. I hope that before he goes to any ministerial meeting there is a very clear understanding of what the agenda is so that the interests of the Canadian wheat producers may not be compromised before we get there.

Senator Argue: I can assure the honourable senator that the position of the Canadian wheat producers will not be compromised before the meeting, during the meeting or after the meeting as long as I am playing the role that I am playing today. I had the opportunity to meet with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and he explained to me, and to others at the meeting, what action the United States had taken in order to encourage their producers to cut back some acreage.

Undoubtedly, it would flow from his statement that if Canada could be encouraged to reduce its acreage, that would be well and good, but I pointed out to the Secretary of Agriculture that Canada has its system well under control, is well managed through our Canadian Wheat Board system, is managed that way because of the support of the producers of western Canada, and that we are not in any way contributing by our action to unmanageable world surpluses in wheat, oats or barley. In fact, the Canadian share of the international market for wheat has gone down from something well in excess of 30 per cent ten years ago to 17 or 18 per cent today.

[Senator Perrault.]

The position of the government is that Canadian grain producers should be encouraged to continue their production; that the Canadian Wheat Board should be encouraged to continue its highly successful efforts in marketing Canadian grain throughout the world; and that our objective is to maintain our current 17 or 18 per cent of the world market in wheat. If we can do that and have a reasonably good market for barley, our producers—because the international market for grain in recent years has been expanding—can look forward to having a market that is expanding.

The honourable senator does not need to worry that I am going into any meeting where I will be accepting any suggestion that there should be a cutback in Canadian acreage because our system, through the Canadian Wheat Board, is well managed, as the honourable senator knows, through the quota system. If we happen to have a bumper crop from time to time and there is some additional carry-over that is kept on the farms, then I do not think that is a catastrophe. There is going to be a slight increase in the carry-over on July 31 of this year as compared to July 31 of last year.

Speaking as a farmer, if I have ten bins capable of storing wheat, I do not necessarily have to have, in my judgment, the wind whistling through those ten bins every July 31. I would be quite happy to have two or three of them full. It is a pretty good asset when one talks to one's banker, but the honourable senator does not need to be concerned about the position of the Canadian government.

Senator Roblin: That is a speech I would have liked to have made myself. It is a very good statement of the Canadian government's position, from my point of view. However, I have to comment to my honourable friend that he is the one who led me down the path of thinking about a cartel not so long ago when he did not occupy his present position with respect to wheat sales in the world at large. He will recall my real reservations as to the advisability of approaching these problems from the point of view of a cartel because, in my opinion, it would simply never work anyway.

● (1420)

From what he has said, I gather that the minister has disabused his mind of any approach to world marketing problems along that line. If so, I am happy because I think it would be well for him if he were to do so.

However, I must warn him that he may have a misapprehension about his relationship with the United States Secretary of Agriculture because the minister, in the Senate, said:

It is fair to say that the Americans, including Secretary of Agriculture Block, have a good understanding of Canadian policies in the grain business—

On the same day, after the meeting, Mr. Block, in talking about Canadian agricultural policies, is reported as having said, "I don't understand them . . . I didn't understand them before and I still don't after today's meetings."

Although that is given as a quotation by Mr. Block, I really grade the minister's powers of persuasion much higher than that. In any case, I would hope that they were higher than that.

I am simply saying that, if my honourable friend is to attend a further conference with Mr. Block, I think he should put both hands up to guard himself because, obviously, Mr. Block is not sympathetic to my honourable friend's point of view; he does not understand it, and my friend has a little missionary work to do.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, if I go into a conference with Secretary of Agriculture Block, I do not feel that I am at any disadvantage whatsoever as far as understanding the grain business is concerned. I am certainly not going to be any part of any agreement which would suggest that any Canadian acreage farmers may wish to seed to these grains should be curtailed.

As to Senator Roblin's interpretation of what I have said about a grain cartel, if he goes over the record very carefully he will see that I have never advocated a grain cartel; I have never used that word. I do not think a grain cartel is possible; I do not think it is practical. However, I do think there is a chance for co-operation amongst exporting nations, and that is the term I used. I think there is ample room for co-operation and some co-ordination of policies. Canada is perfectly capable of co-ordinating its own system in the world grain market in such a way as to help contribute to more stable returns for producers.

Senator Roblin: My memory does not coincide with my honourable friend's about the use of the word "cartel," but I am willing to accept his explanation. I wish him well because he will have a tiger by the tail.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to clarify the reply I made to Senators Murray and Roblin a few moments ago, since I understand their constant pursuit of absolute precision.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I wish to add that the seasonally adjusted current account balance is estimated to have moved from a $245 million—that is current dollars—deficit in the fourth quarter of 1981 to a $288 million surplus in the first quarter of 1982.

This improvement was the result of a substantial 32 per cent growth in the merchandise trade surplus that I talked about a moment ago, up to $3.6 billion.

The non-merchandise trade deficit rose 11 per cent, to $3.3 billion, as the net payment of interest and dividends increased over the previous quarter.

● (1425)

Preliminary estimates for merchandise trade in April show a surplus of nearly $1.5 billion, in current dollars, on a seasonally adjusted balance of payments basis—an increase of almost $300 million from the revised March surplus. This improvement in the trade balance resulted from a combination of rising exports, up 2.3 per cent—which does not quite correspond to what Senator Murray said a moment ago—and declining imports, down 2.1 per cent. Honourable senators will notice that 2.3 per cent is more than 2.1 per cent; that is fairly elementary, I think.

The trade surplus for the period February to April, 1982 thus totalled $3.7 billion, up 14 per cent from the previous three-month period. I wanted to give that additional detail, honourable senators, so that Senator Roblin will agree that my usual precision is being maintained.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Would the minister agree, in the light of all these figures, that the Canadian dollar should have strengthened, and if not, why not?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there are some additional factors related to all of this and to the value of the Canadian dollar. There is one important factor which Senator Charbonneau, with his background expertise, can no doubt explain in more detail than I can. I am speaking, of course, about the increase in interest rates in the United States, which obviously have a greater influence than even these rather significantly improved figures.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if I may, and in the name of common sense, I will ask a supplementary question about the behaviour of the Canadian dollar. If I correctly understand the answer given by the honourable minister, there is no problem in the fact that the Canadian dollar is going down. I suppose, then, that the problem lies in the American dollar going up.

Senator Olson: That is what I tried to explain a minute ago.

Senator Tremblay: If there is no problem with the fact that the American dollar is going up, are we to conclude, from the answers given by the minister, that we should be very happy with the situation?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend, of course, is asking my opinion as to whether or not I am happy.

Senator Tremblay: It is a question of common sense, of course.

Senator Olson: Well, in terms of common sense, there is more to it than that. I can read the figures again, in case Senator Tremblay missed them, but the fact is that the Canadian dollar has not weakened against a strong United States dollar, for all of the reasons I have related, as much as has any other major currency in the world but one, so I suppose there are degrees of happiness, and we can take our choice.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I remind the minister of la fable du charbonnier. He had a guest arriving who was to be served soup. It was cold outside, however, and the guest blew on his hands. The charbonnier asked him, "Why are you doing that?" The guest replied, "Just to make them warmer." The charbonnier then served the soup. The guest blew on the soup, and again the charbonnier did not understand. He asked, "Why are you doing that?" "To make it colder." The charbonnier did not understand, so he killed the guest. Are we in the same situation regarding the Canadian dollar?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the little story that my honourable friend has told us sounds exactly like the Conservative view: no matter which way it is, it is not quite right.

● (1430)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If the problem is not with the other currencies, what is the Bank of Canada achieving by intervening in the market? If the problem is that the United States dollar is rising in value, of what use is intervention by the Bank of Canada? What influence can that have on the value of the U.S. dollar within that country itself?

Senator Olson: We understand that, and I think that my honourable friend, by tomorrow afternoon, will perhaps understand what I have said and what the Minister of Finance has said over and over again; that is, that the intervention is not an attempt to have a Canadian dollar that is valued differently than the market would in fact dictate. What he has said is that there are times when there is intervention with the object of avoiding extremes. My honourable friend ought to know, too, that such interventions involve exchanging other currencies, in most cases United States currency, for Canadian dollars to prevent those wild or extreme fluctuations that I talked about; but the market in fact will set the value. As my honourable friends are pointing out—

Senator Flynn: You mean Senator Frith?

Senator Olson: Yes—the object is to discourage attempts to speculate, and therefore profit from these kinds of changes in value in extreme amounts over the short term.

Senator Flynn: I do not see how you can speak of extremes. The dollar has been going down very slowly. There has been no extreme at all; there has been a gradual downfall of the dollar.

As far as the United States dollar and other currencies are concerned, the minister is boasting that all the other currencies except one are lower than ours. I do not see any need for the intervention, because there has been no extreme. The problem is the strength of the U.S. dollar, not the weakness of the Canadian dollar.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend will understand, I am sure, that he himself has just made exactly the right argument and given the right reasons for any intervention by the authorities, namely, that there has been a gradual decline, and in fact, a fluctuation—in spite of Senator Murray shaking his head, which he often does. What has happened over the past few weeks is that there has been fluctuation.

Senator Flynn: What about 92½ cents—the Diefenbuck?

Senator Olson: Have you been having a conversation with someone else?

Senator Flynn: Go on. What we have to say does not matter anyway.

Senator Olson: It does matter, because I think the Honourable Leader of the Opposition asked a question, and at the same time gave one of the best answers to that question. He really ought to see the relationship here. He does understand, even though he denies it. The whole idea was to have a gradual change in the value of the Canadian dollar to where the market dictates what it should be, and there has not been a wide or extreme fluctuation, which is exactly what my honourable friend has said. The Canadian dollar has been settling down slightly, but it has done so with some fluctuations in both directions.

Senator Flynn: Does the minister suggest that if the Bank of Canada had not intervened the Canadian dollar would be at a lower point today, compared to the United States dollar? Is he saying, furthermore, that that was the only thing that was preventing a more abrupt downfall? If that is all the intervention accomplished, I do not see the use of it.

Senator Olson: What I am saying, honourable senators, is that it avoided extreme fluctuations. There have been several days, for example, where the change has been more than 0.6, settling down then to an amount less than that. As a matter of fact, I think it has fluctuated nearly 0.5 today.

My honourable friend should also know, of course, that it is not a question of spending the dollars. All that is being done is to effect an exchange in the currency to counteract extreme trends.

Senator Flynn: Some time ago I asked the minister about the statement made by the Prime Minister, about a month ago, that we had the choice of letting the dollar go to 75 cents in order to fight high interest rates. We are getting there now, in any event, and the intervention of the Bank of Canada has not prevented this downfall of the dollar. How can he reconcile that statement of the Prime Minister with a dollar that is going to be at 75 cents pretty soon and interest rates that remain high—in fact, double the rates in the United States?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend is doing what he does very conveniently, that is, to put things in the wrong sequence, which he did when he talked about this the other day.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister said this, not me.

Senator Olson: You put things in the wrong sequence. You indicated the other day that if the interest rates were to be brought down, the dollar may go to 75 cents; but my friend puts things the other way round, and of course that is wrong.

The other thing that is important in all of this is that some changes have taken place in the relative attractions of places where some of the international funds that are highly liquid should be put. It would take a long time to explain that to my honourable friend. If I get an opportunity I will be glad to do that, but those factors have all been at work in what has happened in the last few days.

Senator Flynn: It is no use.

Senator Olson: You will read all about it tomorrow.

EXCISE TAX ACT PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-112, to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might interrupt for a moment, perhaps under the heading of "Delayed Answers," though it does not really matter, because the relevant questions relate to the subject of this bill.

The questions were asked by Senator Smith. Does Senator Roblin want to have the information arising from those two questions now, or will I provide it when I close the debate?

One question dealt with the definition of a gigajoule, which Senator Roblin probably knows; and the other question dealt with the status of the Alberta reference. Perhaps Senator Roblin knows that the answer is that, on a somewhat narrow factual point with regard to gas produced from Alberta-owned wells, the reference went against the federal government. The argument has been heard by the Supreme Court of Canada and judgment was reserved.

I can give the technical answer to the question as to what is a gigajoule, but I think Senator Roblin already knows the answer. I will deal with the matter more technically when I close the debate.

Senator Roblin: I am rather flattered, honourable senators, to be referred to as an expert on gigajoules. I can say that it is a hell of a lot of gas, but beyond that I will not go.

My task this afternoon is to say something about Bill C-112, which is one of the centre pieces in the taxing structure set up under the National Energy Program. Of course, there are a number of bills which, constitutionally, and from a parliamentary point of view, have to be dealt with separately. I quite concur with that approach. It is also a fact, however, that these bills are all, in another, larger policy sense, related, and it is a little difficult, I think, to confine oneself to the exact terms of this bill because of its wider implications.

The related character of these bills dealing with energy has, I think, been illustrated by the two excellent speeches that I had an opportunity of listening to, one by Senator Balfour and one by Senator Macquarrie, on other bills. I may also say that the only gleam of light on the other side of the house with respect to discussion of energy was that offered by Senator David Steuart, who made some interesting comments the other night on the potash situation in Saskatchewan.

The background of this bill, C-112, leads one inevitably to review an episode in the economic history of Canada that is rather sad, because the disorder and chaos that have been created in that field of economic activity on which we have been relying for the impetus we need to keep our economy afloat, namely, the energy industry, has been seriously damaged by the self-inflicted wounds to which we bear witness.

I do not really think that I should oblige every member of this house to listen to me, but those who do not want to listen might have the courtesy to leave the chamber and conduct their conversations some place else. I wonder if I can persuade the Minister of State for Economic Development to pay some attention to that plea, because I do not want to have to shout.

An Hon. Senator: Take the meeting outside.

Hon. G. I. Smith: He couldn't understand it anyway.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: He understands it all too well. That is why he is going. He does not want to listen to it. That is probably the best course for him to follow, because in this bill we have major tax elements which comprise the centrepiece of national energy policy number one. We have the national gas and gas liquid tax on domestic supplies; we have the petroleum and gas revenue tax; and we have the incremental oil revenue tax, all of which, added together, will raise enormous sums. It is estimated that in the current fiscal year $4.2 billion will be provided to the treasury of Canada by the revenues raised by these three taxes alone, and they are far from the grand totality of the taxes which the energy system is bearing in this country today. It represents enormous sums of money.

I point out to the house with respect to one of these taxes—namely, the national gas and gas liquid tax—that it is one which is regulated by order in council. How we, as a responsible body of legislators, could observe with an easy mind this breach of the taxing power of Parliament is something that I do not know, and I do not believe that we should condone the exercise of enormous taxing powers—$1.5 billion this year would be raised by this tax—that is subject to regulation by order in council.

There are many uncertainties in the tax basis with which this bill deals. My honourable friend, Senator Smith, referred to the Alberta court case, and we know that insofar as it affects exports in Alberta of provincially-owned gas to the United States, there was a saw-off in the energy agreement of last fall, where the Province of Alberta said it would not press the point legally, and the Government of Canada said, "Well, we will reduce the tax to zero"; and so on that happy note they adjusted their differences. But it still remains to be seen whether there are not other challenges to this piece of legislation.

The bill assumes, in a confident manner, that the Hibernia situation will be resolved in favour of the government—although that matter is before two courts at the present time. So there are certain uncertainties that we can hardly weigh or balance at the present time with respect to the ultimate impact of this bill, and with respect to the legal factors on which it is based.

[Senator Roblin.]

While the future impact of these taxing measures is perhaps uncertain, the past record of the taxes that have been applied so far in the petroleum and energy business is quite clear. There has been an enormous increase in the tax demand on Canadian energy users, and this bill is an integral part of that tax demand on the citizens of Canada. For example, the federal tax on gasoline in December 1979 was 18 cents per gallon. The corporation tax accounted for four cents; the Syncrude special tax accounted for two cents; the federal sales tax was five cents; the excise tax was seven cents, and the total was 18 cents. In this year of grace, right now, the tax on that same gallon of gas, insofar as the federal tax collector is concerned, is not 18 cents but 60 cents. That is quite a rise in the course of a couple of years. The corporation tax is now 6 cents. There is no longer a Syncrude tax; the federal sales tax is 13 cents and the excise tax is seven cents. The petroleum compensation tax, which is supposed to save Canadians from the vicissitudes of international oil prices, is 18 cents. The Canadian ownership tax, which is the price we pay for Petrofina, is four cents; the petroleum and gas revenue tax included in this bill is seven cents; the incremental oil revenue tax included in this bill is five cents, for a total of 60 cents. There may be other taxes. If so, I have been unable to track them down, but with respect to this situation, the tax on gasoline by the gallon by the federal government has gone from 18 cents to 60 cents in this short period of time. My calculations indicate that at this time next year I will be able to say it is 77 cents.

So much for the election of 1979. So much for those promises so confidently given to Canadians about a made-in-Canada price for gasoline and the tax implications that would result from that. Is it any wonder that there is some lack of confidence in the integrity of politicians today? I use the general term. Is there any doubt that there is some lack of confidence in the reliability of the present administration in carrying out its undertakings to the people of this country?

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Senator Roblin is making an important speech and is putting a number of important facts on the record. Without any reflection on the Deputy Leader of the Government, who is a prominent member of this chamber, why is the Minister of State for Economic Development—there is not much development, God knows, under him—not here? There is no Cabinet minister in the chamber to listen to Senator Roblin. I repeat that this is no reflection on Senator Frith, but surely Senator Olson should be here to listen to this speech. Is he so busy he cannot remain in this chamber—

An Hon. Senator: He doesn't care.

Senator Muir: He doesn't care. He doesn't give a damn, or so it appears from his attitude. In my opinion, he should be here, and I would appreciate it if the Deputy Leader of the Government would do his utmost to get the minister, who is supposed to have great influence in the Cabinet, back into the chamber to listen to what is being said by Senator Roblin.

I apologize for interrupting Senator Roblin, and I appreciate the fact the Deputy Leader of the Government is here, but, in all frankness, there is no Cabinet minister present.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that Senator Muir, being an experienced parliamentarian, realizes that ministers have to plan their time, and they cannot always be sure when a bill in which they are interested might be debated. Very often ministers are at a disadvantage in terms of their responsibilities. I am sure that Senator Olson would like to hear Senator Roblin's intervention because they have shared many exchanges during Question Period. The difficulty is that a minister can always plan his time for Question Period but he cannot always do it in connection with an Order of the Day that might be spoken to after Question Period.

I presume the minister had another obligation to fulfil. I know that Senator Perrault felt that he should appear at this afternoon's meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, because the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy is a witness. Possibly that is why Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, is also not in the chamber. Perhaps he too wishes to be present at the committee meeting where a rather important bill is to be considered. I do not know what other obligation Senator Argue had, but I assume that he faced a similar problem. I am sure that I can honestly and safely say on their behalf that they are sorry that they have to miss Senator Roblin's important intervention. I am sure that all of them, particularly Senator Olson and Senator Austin, will take the opportunity to read the honourable senator's speech in Hansard.

Hon. Eric Cook: They are playing softball.

Senator Muir: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his response, but it is a very weak excuse. Senator Austin is so important that I had forgotten he was a Cabinet minister sitting in this chamber.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Oh, oh!

Senator Muir: I wish Senator Steuart would stop his—

Senator Steuart: Can't I have a little yawn once in a while?

Senator Muir:—grunting, groaning and snorting up there on the back benches.

Senator Steuart: I am waiting to hear the speech.

Senator Muir: We are going to hear Senator Roblin's speech, and Senator Steuart will hear a damned good one. Is the Deputy Leader of the Government telling me that Senator Olson did not know that this matter was going to be debated today? He is the man to whom questions are posed, regarding economic development, gas prices, oil prices, and all those mega-projects. He is the guy with the mega-mouth, talking all the time about mega-projects that are falling apart. I appreciate what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said, but, I repeat, it is a very weak excuse.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I might intervene, as being one of the parties involved, I would like to continue my speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I much appreciate Senator Muir's efforts to drum up an audience for me, but I remembered that many are called but few are chosen. I believe the chosen must be here because, God knows, we called on Senator Olson to stay, but he did not choose to; he left anyway.

● (1450)

So, Senator Muir, the chosen are here and we will just have to do the best we can with them. Thank you for your kind attention.

Senator Muir: I am sorry that I interrupted.

Senator Roblin: Do not be sorry because it enables me to say twice what I was going to say anyway. Now I can say it all over again. We were talking about the made-in-Canada price for gasoline, and I was illustrating to this chamber what had happened to the made-in-Canada taxes in recent times.

Let me tell you what that means in terms of the person who buys a gallon of gasoline—if he is legally entitled still to use that offensive description of a quantity of liquid—in the city of Winnipeg. The last time I looked, the price was $1.91, and His Honour the Speaker pro tem has probably had the same experience as I have.

If I had gone to St. Paul, which is the largest American city close to us, on April 21—because prices change all the time I must give the date—I could have got the same quantity, one imperial gallon, for $1.83 Canadian. That is the made-in-the-United States price for oil and gas as opposed to the made-in-Canada price for oil and gas. How we were adjured to support those who believe that a made-in-Canada price would be advantageous and beneficial to the people of this country, and to let the Liberal Party of Canada devise a formula to bring this magic into effect, is beyond me. Now we see the result, and it seems to me that it is really going to be difficult to claim that the made-in-Canada price in oil has been particularly advantageous to the people of this country.

What it really has done, and let us not overlook this fact, is that it has enabled the federal government to gather into its revenue and into its treasury the money it needs to continue on its—I won't say reckless financial course because I do not believe in strong language,—on its improvident policy and its improvident pattern.

In the case of heating oil, the situation is even worse. In December 1981 heating oil carried a tax of 10 cents, and in March 1982 it carries a tax of 40 cents, and God knows where it is going from there. When one considers the impact of the cost of heating in Canada, one has to be impressed by the manifest questionability of this particular tax and its inflationary impact. Maybe you do not have to drive your car in this country, but by the Lord Harry you have to heat your house, and when a tax is going up by four times, from 10 cents to 40 cents, in the course of a couple of years under a made-in-Canada energy policy, one has to comment on the inflationary effect.

But taxes, of course, are only the tip of the iceberg when we are looking at this energy policy that we have now. What we have entered into is, first of all, a system of front-end loading of taxes. We have abandoned the idea that as a general rule the tax should be on the profit. We have gone entirely over to some concept of royalty which, instead of being a modest 12.5 per cent as it started out to be, is now a very large portion indeed of the front-end loading. When we add that mixture to the fluctuation in the price of oil, we have a recipe for disaster. That is precisely what has happened. Nobody who devised this policy seems to have ever taken into account that it was possible for the price of oil to go down as well as to go up, because it is certainly not reflected in any of the measures. This bill enshrines front-end loading taxes, nails them down, casts them in iron and makes them an inevitable part of our tax structure.

There is also administrative pricing. Executive pricing and costing by public officials is what we have now in the oil and gas business. Regulation and intervention at an unprecedented level certainly has caused confusion—and I do not think that is too strong. Some might say that it has caused havoc, and I would be inclined to say that that is nearer the mark. But up to the present time, it certainly has caused a haemorrhage of cash flow to all people in the oil business.

We know from The National Energy Program, Marc II, which I will come to in a minute, that even though the government's reaction time is deplorably slow, and even though it denied the facts long after they became evident, even this lot could not stand still on the National Energy Program, Marc I. They had to make some changes in it.

So they looked around, and what did they see? They saw the two major oil sands projects scuttled. The Alsands is nothing but a history of hesitation, fumbling, or misapprehension of the facts, and at the last minute when the project was clinically dead, the government came along and offered too much too late. That is the history of the management of the Alsands project. The offer made by the Government of Canada to the Alsands people in the final day was one that, in my view, would hardly stand the final light of sound examination. They offered too much too late, so nothing happened.

In the Beaufort Sea, we see a drama—perhaps a tragedy, but I hope not—unfolding. We see Dome Petroleum, which is the darling of the National Energy Program entering upon evil and difficult times. These are entrepreneurial men who are daring and who take risks. They build—and I pay my respects to them as constructive Canadians—but they were tempted by the National Energy Program to Canadianize something which they really did not have the financial muscle to pay for, and that is the situation now. I suggest to this house, as I have tried to indicate in some of my exchanges with the Minister of State for Economic Development recently—

Hon. C. William Doody: The late minister.

Senator Roblin: No, just the absent minister. He is not late yet.

I suggest to the absent minister that the government will have to decide, and decide very soon, what they are going to do about Dome in order to make sure that it does not go belly-up.

[Senator Roblin.]

We are seeing these great national projects on which we had relied for the economic health of this country being overturned one by one and put down by factors which are directly traceable to the National Energy Program that we have in this country.

I am not saying that we should not have a National Energy Program. I think we should, but I think we should have one that works, and that is not the case with the one we have now. We have seen, from the experience of the last 18 months, that the National Energy Program is not working in the way that it was advertised. Indeed, it has been adverse to our interests.

If we are having trouble with the “biggies” such as Dome Petroleum, the small operators, as this house has been told on so many occasions, have either been driven to the wall or driven out of the country. Perhaps that is an exaggeration and it is not quite that tough, but it is almost that tough. It is very tough. Small companies have suffered from the lack of cash flow and the high price of money, and they have had to turn themselves inside out just to stay in existence. Anyone who follows the financial press and sees the profit and loss statements these companies are rendering these days and the imbalance of their debt obligations as compared to their resources, understands what I mean when I say they are being pushed to the wall by the policy we have been following in this National Energy Program.

There is an argument about drillers emigrating—how many drillers stayed, and how many drillers left. It is immaterial. We know that a lot of them have left and that drilling in this country in 1981 was down, and that drilling for the same period in the United States was up. If that does not say something about the relative equity of the two policies between the two countries, I would like to know what it does say. We have seen evolved in this National Energy Program the refusal of the Canadian energy system to make use of the supplies of good oil which we have in Alberta—25 per cent of it locked in the ground and not coming up—when we were buying all kinds of the same stuff, or something not as good, from foreigners with the money that this tax bill provides for the purpose.

In spite of the fact that it has been brought to the attention of the government so far, nothing has been done that seems to get to the root of the matter. I have seen estimates that it is costing us $9 million a day to subsidize the import of foreign oil, while our own Canadian oil lies unpurchased and unused in the ground. That cannot make good sense.

There is the flight from the Canadian dollar. We have been talking about the dollar a lot lately. If honourable senators will go back to the report that the Governor of the Bank of Canada delivered a few months ago they will find there his opinion that the National Energy Program has been part of the reason for the flight from the dollar, and has reflected on the interest rate policy which he has been following. If people have been paying any attention to what has been going on in the House of Commons committee that is investigating bank profits, they will have noticed that the Canadian “buy-out” has cost us some $8 billion, according to one estimate, without securing any increase in the supplies of this country. That certainly has to work towards a weak Canadian dollar and towards high interest rates.

● (1500)

The inflationary effect and the effect on interest rates caused by the National Energy Program are clearly discernable. No one, I think, would say that that is the sole cause of our problems; that is only fair and right, because it is not. But it is a major component, and when it is added to the other problems we are struggling with, such as lack of confidence by investors at home and abroad in the Canadian economy, one can understand this, added on to the top, really puts the icing on the cake, if I may mix a couple of metaphors.

I hope and believe that the flight of capital from Canada last year is moderating. It will have to moderate, or else we will be in terrible trouble. In 1981, when the full force of the National Energy Program was felt, foreigners withdrew $5.3 billion from Canada because of the Canadianization of the industry, or, as was the case in large measure, the nationalization of the industry, which are two different things. I am much more inclined to favour Canadianization than I am nationalization.

Canadians themselves transferred nearly $5 billion out of the country because they found better places to invest in than there are in Canada. Then there was another $8.5 billion that left the country, for which no one can attach any reason. Those amounts combined give a total of $18.6 billion that left the country in 1981. We cannot stand that kind of drain or haemorrhage. One asks why the Canadian dollar is weak. That drain has to be a big part of the answer to that question, and the National Energy Program has to accept its share of the blame for producing that unsatisfactory situation.

As I mentioned a minute or two ago, we are now on to a National Energy Program, Marc II, the son of NEP. NEP's son does not sound right, so I think I shall stick with the National Energy Program, Marc II. We see there that the government has recognized some of the dangers that they were running into and have improved the cash flow to many companies in the oil business. I have to say that I am pleased that that has been done.

My hope is that that will prove to be enough. No one wants to see that industry flounder any longer than necessary. Some in the industry say that that is not enough, and there is evidence to that effect. I hope, however, that if it seems to be something short of what is required, the government will not wait another 18 months until the house is collapsing about their ears before they do something about that. I hope, if they see it is not working as expected, that they have the agility and promptness of mind and action to make some changes quickly. In the meanwhile, let us hope it works.

The Canadianization policy started 18 months ago, and, though it may not have gone into reverse, it certainly has lost its steam. It had to lose its steam because the Minister of Finance told it to. The Minister of Finance told the banks of Canada not to lend money for Canadianization of the oil industry, particularly to pay foreigners. He told them not to do that, and they did not do that. The thing cooled off. So, there has been a halt, or a pause at any rate, in the Canadianization policy by government decree. That indicates that some of these matters could well have been anticipated before the whole debacle began.

In the $2 billion total of National Energy Program, Marc II reversals for infusion of cash into the oil business, we see that the big companies, and they are almost all American, are the big winners in this scheme. If you do not think so, just take a look at the paper that the Minister of State for Economic Development was kind enough to give me last evening. This paper is entitled The National Energy Program: Update 1982, and tells us what the large producers are getting. It certainly looks pretty rich to me.

I am afraid that, as far as the small producers are concerned, a good deal of that money will never be paid out to a drilling rig. I think that most of that money will be paid to the banks. They will get it to pay the interest that is owing. If the company is lucky, it may be able to reduce the principal as well, but it seems to me that that large inflow of capital to small companies, which is trumpeted so loudly, and for which I must say I am thankful, even though I draw this to your attention, will not result in as much extra activity in the industry as you and I would like to see. Most of it will go into keeping these companies solvent and paying principal and interest payments to their creditors.

These are matters which we should look at, and which leads me to the conclusion that perhaps it is not enough, particularly when you consider that several of the items for which a tax holiday is granted, the taxes in this bill being among them, is for a two-year period only. One would have to think that long before the end of that time something else will have to be done, or we are going to find that we are not much further out of the mess than we are at the present time.

Looking at the National Energy Program, Marc II, one has to weep for self-sufficiency. Whatever became of self-sufficiency? We were told that we were going to achieve that with Alsands. Not bloody likely! Not these days. We were told we were going to achieve it with the Beaufort. Well, I hope so, if we keep Dome going.

Senator Doody: Hibernia.

Senator Roblin: The last one is Hibernia, and if my honourable colleague's friends in Newfoundland win the court case, heaven knows what will happen there.

So, I think one of the big casualties of the NEP has been the drive to self-sufficiency. That may still be within reach. I never underestimate the ingenuity of mankind. You cannot tell. It may be within reach by 1990, but I would have to say that it looks like it is not nearly as good a bet as it was before. The reason why it is not as good is because of the things that we, in Parliament, have authorized and done. That is one of the main reasons. There are others, but we have to take a good deal of the credit ourselves for being further away from self-sufficiency than we were when we started, and the reasons for self-suficiency are just as strong and just as compelling now as they ever were.

Another aspect of the National Energy Program was to get a great deal of money into the treasury, and I think it will do that, but it certainly is not going to get as much as the authors of this policy originally thought.

Honourable senators, I shall only detain you a few minutes longer. I wish to say once again that if we wanted a made-in-Canada National Energy Program, if we wanted a made-in-Canada price for gasoline, heaven knows we have one. Whether we are satisfied with that or not is another question. When federal gasoline taxes have risen from 18 cents a gallon to 60 cents a gallon since the policy started, and headed to 77 cents a gallon next year, when the price of gasoline in Winnipeg—and I had better be right because Senator Everett is here, and if anyone knows the price of gasoline in Winnipeg, he does—is $1.91 a gallon, but less than that in St. Paul, Minnesota on the date on which I checked, we have to see that there are certainly grave defects with respect to the policy enshrined in the National Energy Program, Marc I or Marc II. That incorporates some of the most unfortunate miscalculations as to the course of economic history, and we are enshrining them in Bill C-112.

The essence of the matter is that Bill C-112 imposes an unprecedented tax load on the energy users of Canada, which is needed to sustain an unprecedented program of spending. It is as clear as fate can be, and that is all on the backs of the Canadian taxpayer in the first instance, and on the backs of a gravely wounded energy industry in the second.

Intervention has not been an outstanding success in the National Energy Program. The problem of the planners was a simple one, and has been the same throughout the ages. It is not peculiar to Canada; it is everywhere you look. The problem of the planners was how to make their theories prevail over the reality. That is the problem, and when the theories get away from reality, you patch them up, bolster them and make little changes hoping by one means or another to catch up with the true facts of life as they disclose themselves, and it becomes more difficult as time goes on.

● (1510)

The advantages of the market system, to me at any rate, become even more marked when one compares them with the problems of planning as disclosed in the National Energy Program. I do not know whether we are learning anything from this rather expensive lesson we have imposed on the people of Canada. I, for one, hope that we have, and that, whatever may have been done in the past, we will have the fortitude to say that we recognize errors, we will correct them and we will get this country back on the path to development and prosperity.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, first, I should like to answer two questions raised last evening by Senator Smith. His first question was with reference to the meaning of gigajoule. I could not give him the answer to that question at the time because I could not find the piece of paper on which I had the definition. One gigajoule is approximately 7.3 per cent less than 1,000 cubic feet. Thus, a tax rate of 63 cents per gigajoule translates roughly to 68 cents per thousand cubic feet. A gigajoule is a billion joules, and it is now the metric unit of measurement used in natural gas transactions between transmission companies and distributors.

Senator Steuart: Oh, my God!

Senator Frith: To answer in clearer terms Senator Smith's second question, the federal government lost a reference by the Province of Alberta, in the Alberta courts, on the reference question of the application of the gas tax to gas exported from three wells drilled by the Government of Alberta. As I mentioned earlier, the case was subsequently appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, arguments have been presented and judgment has been reserved. The judgment is expected by the end of August.

Senator Roblin quite correctly identified Bill C-112 as an important part of the National Energy Program. It is, therefore, understandable that he would use the occasion to express his views in general on that program. No doubt he would find it understandable also that I do not share his views either as to the adjectives he used to describe the National Energy Program or his evaluation of its success or failure. I do, of course, accept—as he would expect me to—that the objectives of the National Energy Program were put into effect and had to be adjusted to meet the vicissitudes of such things as changes in the international oil supply and demand factors and, therefore, in price. He also, quite fairly, drew attention to the fact that the statement of May 31, 1982, effective as of June 1, 1982, represented an amendment or change in the National Energy Program, particularly with reference to those aspects of the program that are dealt with in Bill C-112.

Looking more directly at Bill C-112, as I mentioned, Senator Roblin used the fact that this bill is an important part of the National Energy Program to make comments on the question of gas prices. I should underline for honourable senators that, dealing specifically with this bill, it is here before us and is part of the National Energy Program more particularly as the implementation of the agreements made with the producing provinces. The tax and price structures that were referred to in Senator Roblin's speech are corollaries to the implementation of those agreements, agreements which I believe all parliamentarians urged the government to reach and that all parties hailed when they were reached. That is not to say that the comments made by Senator Roblin with reference to the attractiveness or desirability of those corollaries are irrelevant, because they are not. They must be viewed, insofar as this bill is concerned, in the context of the implementation of those agreements.

I do not think I can add very much more to what I have already said. I should perhaps make reference to the question of the powers that exist in this bill to implement certain policies by order in council. As Senator Roblin implied, the implementation of some of the provisions in the statement of May 31, effective June 1, will, of course, be done by regulation. In particular, the incremental oil revenue tax adjustment that was announced will be implemented, once this act is passed, by regulation. The Governor in Council has the power to define "income"; therefore, by changing the definition of "income," the alleviating aspects of the changes to the IORT can be implemented.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I share with Senator Roblin his hope that the suggested changes, effective June 1, 1982, will be beneficial. I hope they will be beneficial to the industry as a whole and not just to the large producers. Certainly, the $250,000 tax credit will be beneficial. In many cases the IORT change will be beneficial, as will the reduction of the tax rate from 16 per cent to, in effect, 14.67 per cent.

Before closing the debate, there is one further point I should like to clarify. Last evening, during my remarks on second reading, I said that I understood the bill was already the subject of pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and Senator Roblin doubted that I was correct. I have verified that I was wrong and he was correct. It is part of the National Energy Program, but not part of the package that was referred for pre-study.

I commend this bill to honourable senators on second reading. If it receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Roblin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL DETERMINATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for the second reading of Bill C-104, respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, as you know, Bill C-104 is an act respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination, and it also amends the Foreign Investment Review Act to that end. When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources introduced this bill in the House, he said its purpose was to achieve specific goals of the National Energy Program, namely, energy self-sufficiency and security of supply, Canadianization of the petroleum industry and the establishment of a fair pricing system. According to the minister, this legislation would ensure that Canadians would control the development of their energy resources and it would also enable the government to fulfil its 1980 campaign promise, namely, to create a comprehensive energy program that would help the country become energy self-sufficient. In fact, the government had made considerable progress in this direction, and Canadians had, according to the minister, shown a real desire to achieve these objectives.

[English]

The minister then said that the government intended to achieve these goals through Bill C-104, and that the Canadian people were behind it. He particularly singled out the subsidies contained in the bill which are meant to benefit Canadian-controlled companies, other Canadian investors and foreign companies which are willing to co-operate by allowing increased Canadian control of their enterprises.

This sounds eminently inspirational and commendable, and I only wish that I could have stayed on that "high" before I was asked to speak on this bill today. However, these days, reality has a habit of intruding into the best dreams.

The latest intrusion, of course, comes from the suspension of the Alsands project and the delay—if not the demise—of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline.

While it is true that the world oil situation and price deterioration have much to do with the cancellation of Alsands, I could not help but recollect a column by Ronald Anderson in the Globe and Mail, written on April 29 last. The article was entitled: "Pressures increase for changes in NEP." In this article Mr. Anderson made quite a case for changing the NEP following what he called weakening world oil prices and serious cash flow problems being experienced by Canadian oil companies. He pointed out that foreign-controlled companies, which are discriminated against in the NEP, were loudest in their plea for change, but that others were coming to acknowledge that the oil industry has a convincing case.

He pointed out that falling oil prices have exposed a number of anomalies in the method of determining import subsidy payments, allowing eastern refiners to buy foreign crude more cheaply than western Canadian crude. This, he said, has resulted in a steep decline in western Canadian oil production.

Meanwhile, Premier Lougheed, in a candid interview with a national columnist, spoke of the bitterness of westerners with regard to imports. He said:

Confederation has to work both ways... They're importing oil into Montreal... our wells are shut down, so our service people can't work—while they're paying for imported oil.

Of course, many factors have led to the shutdown of oil production and the sands being priced out of the market. However, I cannot help but feel that the National Energy Program would have served Canada better and led to less disappointment if it had been devised with the business spirit in mind, rather than too much vision and too little solid know-how and too few facts.

The changes brought in by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in May are, unfortunately, too little too late. The global amount of $2 billion might appear dramatic, but we must remember that this is not $2 billion of new money which will come in, all at once, to revitalize the industry. The reduction of a tax which has not yet been levied does give the companies an improved netback picture, but this will occur over a long period of time, and the psychological damage has already been done.

In his column, Mr. Anderson adds that the price problems worsen the already substantial cash flow difficulties created by the NEP and the 1981 energy agreements. This cash position must be improved, but will not be if the NEP, which was conceived with rapidly rising oil prices in mind, is not changed. If oil prices do not reach the levels anticipated, producer netbacks will be inadequate to finance new exploration and development.

Mr. Lalonde's concessions have only produced a chance for oil companies, which are suffering greatly from the high interest rates and their own heavy debt burden, to pay off some of these debts. Although a reduction of 1 per cent in the PGRT does increase the netback, the industry is in such a slump and the economy so shaky that exploration will not increase. Without this increase in exploration activity, self-sufficiency eludes us still longer.

Some other people have even more dramatic complaints about the NEP as it is currently constituted. Mr. F. B. Lamont, managing partner of Richardson Securities of Canada, at a meeting of financial analysts in Winnipeg, was reported to have said that the energy program is doing dramatic and long-term damage to the country's petroleum industry.

The president and chief executive officer of Texaco Canada points to the 25 per cent carried interest in all rights on Canada lands which are reserved for the Crown under the NEP as retroactive confiscation of existing rights. He also feels that the NEP incentives contained in Bill C-104 discriminate against companies.

Since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is anxious to console Canadians for the loss of Alsands by speaking of other projects which will go ahead in the resource industry, as well as the Cold Lake project, perhaps he should consider the remarks made by these experts in the field.

[Translation]

In this bill, Mr. Lalonde is talking about certification of Canadianization. Obviously, if the government is going to use state control for economic purposes, it will be using methods that are alien to common practice in the business world. He may think the end justifies the means, but I cannot help remembering another certificate that has scared off businessmen and greatly reduced economic activity in Quebec. Should we then abandon all efforts to increase Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry? No, certainly not. However, considering the negative reactions of the people concerned, the uncertain situation we are in now as a result of the economic recession and the basic characteristics of these job-creating projects, there may be a case for increased flexibility. Furthermore, it would certainly be more acceptable to investors, both Canadian and foreign, to have the petroleum industry Canadianized through fiscal measures instead of through caveats which seem to be far more doctrinaire than practical.

When he introduced Bill C-104, the minister also expressed the hope that we would achieve energy self-sufficiency by the beginning of the next decade. However, the majority of experts tell us that this is a pipe dream, considering the world oil situation, falling prices, the state of exploration in Canada and the massive capital input required for the mega-projects we would need. There is also a whole series of intangibles, including the danger that certain government policies may cause reluctance among foreign investors, and especially the increasing hostility shown by certain U.S. groups.

[English]

As for Canadian oil producers, although some welcome any incentives, many react as businessmen and wonder whether it is wise to play favourites amongst companies, in the name of Canadianization, when frontier exploration is already dominated by Canadian-controlled companies.

Panarctic is thought to be the most active player in the north. It is said to be 45 per cent owned by Petro-Canada, and the other 55 per cent, according to the annual report, is owned by "29 other largely Canadian companies." The next most active consortium in the Arctic is the Arctic Islands Exploration Group. That consortium is said to be already dominated by Canadians. Dome and Dome Canada, of course, are both Canadian controlled.

Moreover, while the government produces policies aimed at Canadianization, it also produces laws, regulations and taxes which discourage activity by Canadian companies in the oil industry. We have all read of the companies which have moved their rigs south. Although there are also difficulties in the United States, the climate there is still more welcoming to private enterprise.

● (1530)

Meanwhile, the outflow of capital from these investments by Canadians in the United States is hurting our currency. This leads to the need for support operations by the Bank of Canada. Unfortunately, this is done by keeping interest rates high. We all know what these high interest rates have done to our weakening economy: they have caused bankruptcies, layoffs and an unemployment rate of over 10 per cent, and rising.

Perhaps the worst effect of the petroleum incentive grants, as designed, is the psychological one. Canadian companies feel that the government is trying to discourage oil production in Alberta in order to direct it to Crown lands, where it can better control operations and can draw more revenue and greater state ownership. The standard argument is that 22,000 exploration wells in western Canada will "only" prove between 2.6 billion and 3.3 billion barrels of oil, whereas just 75 wells in the north might prove between 2.4 billion and 2.6 billion barrels.

Whether there is much truth to these suspicions is academic, when we consider how much perception counts in the business of risk investments. It is my belief that the government should be doing everything it can to reassure private enterprise in Canada and to maximize development and job creation. There may come a time when we can afford the luxury of increased Canadian ownership through philosophical approaches. We can hardly afford it now. We might even be happily surprised to find that a dynamic private sector development of the oil industry in Canada will operate its own Canadianization merely by becoming so attractive to Canadian investors, and even to individual taxpayers who are encouraged to invest through incentives, that no buy-back program will ever be needed.

As things are developing now, honourable senators, we will soon have no oil industry to Canadianize, nationalize or buy back if we are not careful and if we continue to confuse illusion with reality.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in order to achieve its objective of oil self-sufficiency, the government should modify the discriminatory provisions which are not in the interest of oil production in Canada and are contrary to international statements of principle, to which Canada subscribes, on the movement of private capital between nations. The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has already expressed its disapproval of such discriminatory policies. The industrialized countries should show their solidarity and respect their commitments if their implementation is to be successful and if they are to be in a position to help less developed countries.

In concluding, honourable senators, I strongly recommend that these changes be adopted in order to make Bill C-104 a successful tool for achieving the government's basic objectives.

[English]

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Steuart speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I simply want to say a few words in closing the debate on second reading of this bill. I should like to remind honourable senators of one or two things which have been brought up in the course of this debate. Honourable senators opposite and many people across Canada are heaping blame upon the federal government with regard to the National Energy Program and with regard to most of the problems we find ourselves facing with respect to oil, gas, and energy in general.

Take, for example, the oil sands. Let us not forget that Premier Lougheed, when he was involved in a quarrel with the federal government over the energy agreement, refused, for months and months, to give the oil companies a licence enabling them to go ahead with the tar sands project. In the meantime, inflation and interest rates rose until the projects became uneconomic.

My feeling is that the blame must be shared by both the federal government, in taking so long to make that deal, and the Government of Alberta, in using delaying tactics as a means of blackmail to attempt to get a better deal.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is always the fault of others, never the fault of this government!

Senator Steuart: I would also point out to honourable senators that it was Premier Lougheed who shut off the oil to eastern Canada, and who continued to shut it off, in an effort to get a better deal from the federal government. Perhaps that was good strategy on his part, but it forced the federal government to go to Mexico in order to ensure a supply of oil for eastern Canada—including the province of Quebec, Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin: It is always the fault of others, never the fault of the federal government!

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, it was after the federal government had introduced the incentives—the super-depletion allowance and all of the other incentives—to the industry that the price started to rise. Both the Government of Alberta and the Government of Saskatchewan moved in and attempted to take 95 or 100 per cent of the increase, leaving little or no room for the companies and no room at all for the federal government. That began the quarrel over energy, in the first place.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It was the electoral fraud of 1980!

Senator Steuart: I was convinced then, and I am convinced now, that the federal government is entitled to a fair share of the oil revenue. When you want to cast blame for the situation involving the oil industry and the National Energy Program upon the federal government, I will agree that it has to take responsibility for some of that blame—

Senator Flynn: The federal government lied in 1980.

Senator Steuart: —but the greed and the stubbornness of the provinces added to the problems. The Conservative government in Alberta and the NDP government in Saskatchewan must share some of the responsibility, so I say: Take your blinkers off and put some of the blame where it belongs!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Steuart moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-117, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-117 is an act to amend the Criminal Code. The legislative changes proposed in the bill will strengthen the Canadian horse racing industry. I am not an expert on "the sport of kings," but, according to the debate in the other place last week, there is a great deal of concern about the future of the industry, and there is also broad support for these changes. It is said that they will ensure a viable Canadian horse racing industry in the years to come and greater protection for the betting public.

There are more than 100 horse race tracks across the country. It is a business that employs more than 40,000 people, and there is more than $2 billion invested in land, buildings, equipment and breeding stock.

I am told, honourable senators, that without these proposed changes to the Criminal Code, the horse racing industry will suffer continued decline.

Hon. C. William Doody: No, no!

Senator Stanbury: Some tracks may even be forced to close down.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Some horses will be put to pasture!

Senator Stanbury: Some horse breeders will be put out of business and some communities will be deprived of a pleasurable sporting event.

Senator Doody: Never that!

Senator Stanbury: I also want to stress that these proposed changes have been requested by the industry itself.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: And by the horses!

Senator Stanbury: The first of these changes, honourable senators, is the establishment of an inter-track betting system, which will allow a person at one track, or a person who has a telephone account with that track, to bet on horse races at another track.

It is not known exactly how much new business would be generated as a result of this kind of system, but the fact remains that some major tracks will likely be forced to close unless they can expand their marketing base.

The known advantages of such a system are two-fold: first, it will allow tracks to make better use of their capital investment by using their facilities to handle bets on other races; and, secondly, it will discourage illegal betting through a bookie on major national races. Inter-track betting will give Canadians a legal means of placing a bet on these same races.

This ITB, or inter-track betting, system will be optional, and before any track can use it, it must have the agreement of the other participating track.

The second change, that of increasing the scale of commissions charged by race tracks, is also optional but is urgently needed by the tracks themselves. Presently, the legal scale is between 9.5 and 12 per cent of total bets. The proposed scale would extend the 9.5 per cent rate to 10 per cent for large tracks, and from 12 to 15 per cent for the small tracks.

● (1540)

The daily average revenue received by tracks from the commission rate since 1971, measured in constant dollars, has dropped by 11 per cent. As a result of that diminished return, tracks have been forced to increase their charges for things like admission, parking and food. This, in turn, has had a detrimental effect on attendance.

When the new maximum fees are in place, tracks could take in an additional $17 million, representing, approximately, a 10 per cent increase, plus an additional $11 million if they opt to vary their pool percentages.

The final change being sought is to allow for the transfer of certain administrative matters to be dealt with by way of regulation. Bill C-117 proposes that the maximum number of betting races permitted and the track commission rate be transferred to the regulation-making authority of the Minister of Agriculture. By allowing the track commission rate to be adjusted by regulation, government would be able to react more quickly to the industry's changing needs. The new regulations would also permit two more races per week, and tracks will probably choose to operate them on Saturdays and holidays.

The changes will build on other regulatory reforms recently introduced which have generally been well received by the industry and are slowly resulting in improvement in revenues earned by the industry.

The over-all size and importance of Canada's horse racing industry is probably a great deal larger than most would imagine.

In 1981 Canadians bet about $1.7 billion on horse races, an increase of about 8 per cent over the previous year. The average attendance is about 14 million people per year.

Gross purse money in 1981 rose by 11 per cent to about $108 million, and the provincial tax revenue rose by nearly 10 per cent to $129 million. Despite the large sum of money bet, tracks and horsemen received only 10 per cent, or about $173 million. This amount is not sufficient when you consider that the track operators' expenses and the cost of maintaining the horses have risen year after year, and that so many people, businesses and communities depend on racing.

Pari-mutuel betting at horse races is still the No. 1 area of betting in Canada. And approximately 80 per cent of the total bet is returned to the bettors, making odds at the tracks considerably better than the odds on lotteries.

I urge you to approve these amendments to ensure a continued strong and viable Canadian horse racing industry.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, the bill now before the Senate is certainly far less controversial than any of its predecessors.

Senator Flynn: The horses agree!

Senator Asselin: As far as sports in Canada are concerned, horse racing is as much a sport as hockey or baseball. Soon we are going to have a national lottery, and Canadians will be able to bet on hockey or baseball games. I think that is already being done.

As Senator Stanbury said when he introduced the bill, government intervention is urgently needed to save an existing industry. The purpose of the bill is not to create a new industry but to save one that exists already, especially in view of its financial implications at the national level. Earlier it was said that the industry provides employment for some 40,000 people in Canada. This includes 4,000 jobs in Quebec.

In 1981, some $1.7 billion were invested in this industry. It is said that this year will probably see an increase of 8 per cent. Although Senator Molson may think otherwise, the industry attracts as many fans as hockey. Some 14,000,000 Canadians are interested in race tracks and horse racing.

It is therefore clear, as Senator Stanbury said, that this $2 billion investment across Canada is ample justification for government intervention in order to help the industry resolve its problems.

Existing legislation must be amended. On the opposition side, we have received information provided by race organizers, who said that expenses had increased considerably and that the cost of maintaining horses had also risen. The track commission on pari-mutuel bets has not been raised in ten years.

Therefore, if bets now total $1.7 billion, the race tracks and horse owners are earning only $173 million, more or less equally divided. When we realize that the industry generates provincial taxes evaluated at about $129 million, it is clear that it is indeed a major industry in Canada. Today, because of inflation and higher wages, the financial situation in this and other industries is a difficult one, and we have personally received evidence of these facts.

In Quebec, the race-track in Jonquière closed down a few months ago. The track in Trois-Rivières is about to follow suit, unless the legislation is amended. Senator Roblin tells me that in Manitoba they are facing the same problems. In Windsor, Ontario, workers with permanent jobs in the automotive industry also do a bit of moonlighting, and they used to work evenings at the race track. Now, because of layoffs in the automotive industry, the same employees are now seeking permanent jobs.

Blue Bonnets, one of the big race-tracks in Quebec, has been operating for seventy-five years. Last year, it lost $1.25 million. The track has between 800 and 1,000 employees in Montreal and operates 300 days out of every year. If the legislation is not changed within a few months, the track will have to close down and lay off employees who depend on the industry for a living. I have also been told that if the bill is passed in its present form, the race-track may be able to recover the $1.25 million loss it suffered last year. It is a simple amendment to the Criminal Code. Section 188 of the Criminal Code creates an exemption for those who handle bets. This will increase the profitability of the industry. As Senator Stanbury said, this would discourage illegal betting by making legal betting easier and more attractive. The changes will aim at increasing the purses for each race. There will be new purses, such as the Win 6 and the Big 6, for those who know horse racing. The Minister of Agriculture explained this in the other place. Advance betting will be allowed. At the present time, to bet on a race you have to be physically present at the race track. The bettor has to be where a race is being held. It will now be possible to make bets by telephone. As Senator Stanbury explained, all these systems are optional. Race track owners do not have to implement them.

We must therefore remember two things. There will be inter-track betting and the scale of commissions charged by race tracks will be increased. The proposed scale will extend the 9.5 to 10 per cent rate for large race tracks, and from 12 to 15 per cent for the small tracks.

Many of our colleagues at the national caucus said that this would save the smaller race tracks across Canada.

I also want to note an important change contained in the bill. Instead of always having to amend the statute to make administrative changes, it will be possible to use the regulation-making authority of the minister of Agriculture to make administrative changes concerning race track organizers or owners.

Of course, not everyone agrees with this bill. We have to be broad-minded. Certain religious or social groups in Canada are against betting. They are against gambling, which is the case with some members of our party. Some members of the Liberal Party certainly feel the same way. Their objections concern morality and are certainly well founded. On the other hand, when we are told that as many as 14 million Canadians attended horse races last year, I have the feeling that it would be useful to think about it and try to help this industry survive the present economic difficulties. We respect the views of those who for reason of conscience or principles are basically opposed to this industry. However, I have the impression that many suspicious aspects of on-track betting have been corrected these last few years. I learned recently that race track organizers use a very effective security system. Races are monitored so that they cannot be fixed. This security system is applied for the whole time races are in progress. Organizers also look out for suspicious or undesirable characters at the race track. I learned that the federal Minister of Agriculture appoints inspectors to check the health of horses before they take part in a race. I also learned that jockeys are kept in isolation for three hours before the start of the race with no possibility of contact with the public. This obviously aims at preventing races from being fixed, which would result in certain bettors losing money. I am also informed that jockeys have to take a breathalyzer test every time they ride in a race. Severe suspensions are provided for jockeys who fail to comply. They are more stringent than for many other sports. I am told that when a jockey is caught red-handed, he incurs a life suspension and can no longer be admitted to the race-track.

● (1550)

In short, although if there may be some shortcomings, this bill has numerous positive aspects. We on this side of the House believe that the government should help that industry. We welcome the bill and we intend to support it.

In the other place, the bill was considered by Committee of the Whole. I read the proceedings of the committee of the whole. A few questions were directed to the Minister of Agriculture. The main one was as follows: When did he think that the legislation could be promulgated? The minister replied that his officials had assured him that the bill could come into effect within the next four to six weeks. I do not think, after reading the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole and noting that the debate was quite short that we need to refer this bill to committee.

Honourable senators, we are ready to give it second reading today.

[English]

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Stanbury speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Asselin for his remarks on, and support of, the bill. He displayed a more comprehensive knowledge of the bill than I have and we are all grateful for the light he has shed on the subject.

In view of his remarks concerning the non-controversiality of the bill in the other place, and the fact that he and his colleagues have no desire to have the matter dealt with in committee, I shall propose that the bill receive third reading at the next sitting of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stanbury moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Honourable Peter A. Stollery moved the second reading of Bill C-108, to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3).

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks on Bill C-108, which consists of three elements.

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, Bill C-108 broadens the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board in order to include hydro power transmission and gas and oil distribution. It redefines its jurisdiction in the area of oil and gas export pricing and clarifies a number of provisions in the existing act.

The House Standing Committee on Energy Legislation, which dealt with this bill, held several meetings to hear witnesses. I should like to mention, for instance, the Newfoundland Minister of Energy, as well as representatives from Hydro Quebec and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. Groups and corporations also submitted briefs. In the light of their representations, the committee felt the need to recommend amendments to the bill. I should like to mention a few which I feel are particularly significant. For instance, the amendment introduced at the report stage and dealing with hydro power transmission lines is a major amendment.

[English]

I am sure that honourable senators will be interested to learn, just as I was, the difference between transmitting oil and gas and transmitting electricity. Over the past decade there has been a tremendous increase in technical knowledge which has allowed long distance power transmission. I am sure that honourable senators from Newfoundland and Labrador are very aware of the long-standing controversy between the Province of Quebec and the Province of Newfoundland with regard to the transmission of power.

[Translation]

The National Energy Board already has authority to some extent in the area of international power transmission lines. The National Energy Board Act states that it must hold public meetings when an applicant wants to export power or build an international power transmission line. It may also authorize the building of such a line, determine its location, decide whether such a line is or will be in the public interest, consider all objections raised against the building of such a line and, finally, impose such terms and conditions which it deems necessary to achieve the goals of the National Energy Board Act.

[English]

I might say that I think it is important, because of the extremely important issue between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of Quebec, to be precise when describing the nature of this bill, because it has major implications in the transmission of power and the future of development on the North Shore as well as on the Lower Churchill River. So I hope that honourable senators will be patient with me for a moment as I try to be as explicit as possible on the record, because I am dealing with a very serious problem that has been going on now for approximately a decade. This problem has had a very serious effect on the development of power in the province of Newfoundland and its power to export its hydro-electric power to markets in the United States.

[Translation]

However, there is a shortcoming in the act if we compare pipelines with international hydro power lines. In the case of a pipeline, the National Energy Board Act contains provisions granting certain general powers and prescribing certain obligations with respect to a company which operates a pipeline, but there is no similar provision in the case of hydro power lines. Some of those general powers and obligations have to do with the acquisition, including expropriation, and the conveyance of lands required to build and operate a pipeline.

Those provisions can be found in Part V of the National Energy Board Act. To eliminate that shortcoming, Bill C-108 contains a section under which the provisions of Part V, that is the sections granting general powers or prescribing general obligations with respect to pipeline companies, will also apply to persons operating international hydro power lines. This part will also apply to interprovincial power lines designated by the Governor in Council.

The case of interprovincial hydro power lines is altogether different from that of international lines because, for all practical purposes, the board has absolutely no jurisdiction over them. Bill C-108 will change that by likening an interprovincial line designated by the Governor in Council to an international line. In brief, once an interprovincial line has been designated, the provisions concerning international lines will apply to that interprovincial line.

I must emphasize that the National Energy Board Act will not apply to just any interprovincial line, but only to those which will be specially designated by the Governor in Council. In addition, it should be noted that this power of designation will apply only to future lines to be built; it will not apply to existing interprovincial lines.

With respect to exercising that power of designation, honourable senators, I should stress that the government will make decisions concerning those interprovincial lines only after having taken into consideration the interests of the provinces in this area.

The federal government has no intention of acting unilaterally in such cases and would eventually go ahead only under normal conditions.

[English]

In other words, it was to include the transmission of power to give the National Energy Board the power to extend the kind of regulations that are in effect now with regard to oil and gas transmission to the transmission of hydro-electric power.

[Translation]

As I was saying, the federal government does not intend to act unilaterally on this matter. It would eventually, under normal conditions, only designate a line at the request of one or several provinces.

You are aware that those amendments more specifically earned us the accusation of meddling in the dispute between Quebec and Newfoundland about the transmission of power from Labrador.

The federal government made it very clear it had no intention of meddling or taking sides in that conflict, believing as it does that both parties have much to lose by pursuing the confrontation. The government reiterated its view that the best solution is continuing negotiations between the two provincial governments; a negotiated agreement with mutual compromises is still more favourable for the people of Newfoundland and Quebec than any legal victory that could only result in bitterness and frustration. An agreement will have numerous and long-lasting benefits.

That is why, honourable senators, an amendment was moved in the other place at the report stage. It shows that the government does not intend to get involved in that difference the day the legislation is passed. That amendment provides that amendments on power transmission lines cannot come into force until at least six months after the bill is passed. As far as hydro power exports are concerned, I would point to the amendment recommended by the committee, which will exempt those exports from the provisions in the bill enabling the Board to cancel or suspend an export licence for reasons of public convenience and necessity. This should adequately answer the representations made before the committee on the damage that such a clause could cause to a power export contract.

Bill C-108 also amends a number of sections in the National Energy Board Act.

The amendment withdrawing from the Board the authority to determine the export prices of oil and natural gas and transferring that power to the Governor in Council is self-explanatory. The almost continuous fluctuations of international prices make this a highly political problem. Therefore, the responsibility rests with the nation's political authority.

Indeed, this amendment only sanctions current practice, since oil and gas export prices often are negotiated between the producing provinces, the federal government and the United States.

Another amendment empowers the Board to allocate oil and gas supplies to the various regions of Canada. The purpose of this is quite simple: It is to provide for future situations where the demand for Canadian oil could be slightly higher than available supplies. Of course, this would not create an emergency. However, it is a matter of simple equity that the Board may use its powers to allocate available resources fairly.

Finally, I should like to mention two amendments recommended by the Commons committee on energy legislation. The first deals with members of the Board, and the other with the definition of oil or gas products. In order to prevent any reflection on the impartiality of temporary members, the committee recommended that Board members, as is now the case for permanent members, be prevented from holding positions inconsistent with their duties and obligations as temporary members. As concerns the definition of oil products, it was amended to cover more specifically substances that are an adequate source of energy. These amendments also follow from representations made to the committee.

[English]

Honourable senators, I am sure that there will be many questions raised at the committee stage.

Senator Doody: Would the honourable senator permit a couple of questions, the first being: Precisely what is meant by the phrase "It is not the intent of the Government of Canada to intervene"? I was under the impression that this legislation was to provide access to a power corridor for one province through another.

My second question is: When does this legislation take effect? What is the significance of the six-month figure—

Senator Stollery: Just a moment.

Senator Doody: I can wait. We have waited 10 years.

My first question, if I may repeat it, is: What is the significance of the Government of Canada not intervening or becoming involved in the establishment of a power corridor through one province on behalf of another? My second question is: What is the significance of the six-month period of time to which the senator referred? I did not quite grasp that.

When does that part of the legislation which affects the transmission of power from one province through another province come into effect?

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, if I understood correctly the questions raised by the honourable senator—and, of course, there will be ample opportunity to answer those questions when he raises them at the committee stage—the short answer regarding the question as to when the bill comes into effect is that it, of course, comes into effect when it is passed by Parliament.

The sixth-month period I mentioned is to allow the Minister of Mines and Energy for the Province of Newfoundland, the Honourable William Marshall, and the Minister of Energy and Resources for the Province of Quebec, Yves Duhaime, to resolve the problem that the honourable senator is very much aware of.

It was unanimously agreed to at the committee meetings of the other place that six months be allowed to give them time to complete their negotiations. Apparently, that motion was made by a Conservative member of the committee of the other place, and I believe was unanimously endorsed by the members of that committee, basically to give the parties time, as I pointed out in my speech, to settle the question without having the bad feeling that would result from an enforced decision.

Senator Flynn: I am interested in the questions raised by Senator Doody. You said, clearly, that the Government of Canada does not want to proceed unilaterally in this matter; but the government, in introducing legislation, is certainly acting on its own behalf and against the will of one of the parties involved. It may be acting at the request of Newfoundland, but it is certainly not acting at the request of the Province of Quebec.

When you said that the government does not want to intervene unilaterally in this matter, I think you should correct your text. It was obvious that you were reading from something which was probably prepared for the Honourable Marc Lalonde, who has a certain perception of the situation, because of the fact that you were dealing with amendments recommended by the committee of the other place, which amendments were passed by the House of Commons and which are not relevant to the discussions here.

Senator Stollery: If I could have a question, I might be able to answer it. What exactly is the question?

Senator Flynn: I said that you said that the Government of Canada does not want to act unilaterally in this matter. Don't you think that it is acting unilaterally by proposing legislation that is opposed by one of the parties to the dispute to which you are referring?

Senator Stollery: I thought I pointed out in my speech—and I am sure you heard it—that the question of extending the powers of the National Energy Board to high tension electricity systems was not necessarily aimed at resolving the dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec. The specific problem is not related to the Labrador-Quebec question, but to a power company in Alberta that is trying to export electricity to the United States on a line that passes through the province of British Columbia. I think you have to take into consideration, as I am sure you have, that there has been a serious and important technical breakthrough in the transmission of electricity, and that is the reason we have a bill.

● (1620)

Senator Flynn: I am suggesting to you that you should have withdrawn the word "unilaterally" because you have been talking only about the problem of Quebec and Newfoundland, and now you are saying that this is not really the crux of the matter. You are now saying it is not the reason for the legislation, but you have been saying quite the opposite since the beginning. I am asking you where you found the word "unilaterally". Did you find it in the minister's text? I suggest that you withdraw that word, and then we will understand you.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-111, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-111 is the borrowing authority bill which is an annual event, as honourable senators will remember from previous years.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It may be biannual or semi-annual this year.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn says that it may be biannual or semi-annual this year, but I am talking about the past for the moment.

Honourable senators will remember that, normally, we get a borrowing authority bill around March 31 because the authority normally runs out then. I will explain why we did not get it at that time and why we are getting it now, against this background.

Honourable senators will remember that the reason for the annual arrival of a borrowing authority bill is the Financial Administration Act. Part IV, section 36 of that act requires that:

—no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament.

Consequently, in order to borrow new money to meet the government's financial requirements, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament each year. Authority is not needed to pay off old debts, but it is needed to raise so-called new money.

Honourable senators do not need to wrestle with that weight-lifter's pile of documents under our desks, because Bill C-111 received third reading in the other place this afternoon, so it is quite short, as these bills usually are.

The bill consists of two clauses, the second of which has three subclauses. Clause 2(1) is the borrowing authority and sets out the amount. Clause 2(2) stipulates the expiration date, which is an aspect of the provision that I mentioned that flows from the Financial Administration Act because, under the system, all borrowing authority remaining unused expires on March 31 of each year. Clause 2(3) is essentially technical in nature, making it clear that there is authority to borrow "in a currency other than that of Canada".

Coming back to clause 2(1), the bill is seeking authority for $6.6 billion. As I mentioned, all unused borrowing authority obtained under the Borrowing Authority Act, 1981-82, to the extent that it exceeded $3 billion—and I will explain that in a moment—was cancelled on March 31, 1982, and without new borrowing powers the government will not be able to borrow the necessary funds to meet the financial requirements for 1982-83. The new borrowing authority of $6.6 billion being requested represents the estimated budgetary and non-budgetary financial requirements for 1982-83, as set out in the budget which was presented last November. Therein lies the origin of Senator Flynn's comment that it might be more than annual this year.

In addition to the programmed cash requirements and as has generally been the practice, the government will require some margin for contingencies such as those related to foreign exchange operations.

Honourable senators, in recent years—perhaps it was for 1976-77 or earlier—this contingency has amounted to approximately $3 billion, and that amount was normally added to the total borrowing authority being sought. However, this year $3 billion of the borrowing authority obtained for 1981-82 was exempt from automatic cancellation at the end of the fiscal year and was carried forward. That is the explanation as to how the government survived a borrowing authority past the normal automatic suspension period. This amount of $3 billion was to have been the contingency for 1982-83. However, since there has been no borrowing authority granted for 1982-83, the government so far this year has been charging both its domestic and foreign debt operations to this contingency amount.

Clause 2(3) refers to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currencies. This provision has now been included in the last four borrowing authority acts. Over the years Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies. However, in recent years this clause has been added to confirm Canada's right to borrow in foreign currencies.

Honourable senators will remember that Bill C-96—which has received first reading in the House of Commons,—proposes certain amendments to the Financial Administration Act, including an amendment to clarify the government's ability to borrow and repay in foreign currencies. Once this amendment is made we will not have to have it every year because it will give general authority to borrow in other than Canadian currency, assuming, of course, that the general authority has been given.

I now come to the question of whether additional borrowing authority will be needed. The Minister of Finance, in his appearance before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in the other place, pointed out that the deterioration in the economy since last November will have an impact on the financial requirements for 1982-83. Since the projections were made for the budget of November 12, there has been a severe slowing down of economic growth in all the major industrialized countries. In Canada the depth of this recessionary period has been more severe than was anticipated when the budget was being prepared. As a result of these developments, the minister told—

Senator Flynn: I thought everything was going well.

Senator Frith: Well, it was going better. We had that annual 5 per cent growth rate which disappeared in the first quarter. Of course, Senator Flynn is right that—

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of the optimism of Senator Olson.

Senator Frith: Literally, what Senator Flynn has said is right—things were going a lot better at the time of that budget.

As a result of these developments, the minister told the committee that the government expects the financial requirements will be larger and, consequently, will have to ask Parliament for additional borrowing authority for 1982-83 sometime before the end of the fiscal year.

The minister stated that it was his intention to make a statement on the economy and on the financial requirements for this fiscal year before Parliament recesses for the summer. This statement will provide the House of Commons and the Senate with the information they need to act on a request for additional borrowing authority.

• (1630)

In summary, honourable senators, the bill before us is a request for borrowing authority to cover the projections in the November 12 budget. If changes are made and additional requirements arise as a result of the statement to be made by the minister, or any consequent budget changes, the government will have to come back for additional borrowing authority. In other words, this bill does not anticipate that additional amount.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I ask that this bill receive approval on second reading. If it does, I shall comment on the readiness of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to study and report on the bill after second reading.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I would address a question to the deputy leader on the meaning of clause 2 of the bill in relation to the total amount of money which will be at the disposal of the government for borrowing purposes if this bill is passed.

I thought I heard him say that about $3 billion of existing borrowing authority was still unused. This is described by the earlier words of that clause as follows:

—in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by any Act of Parliament heretofore passed—

This bill authorizes an additional $6.6 billion. If this bill is passed, the total borrowing authority at the disposal of the government will be $9.6 billion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is correct, but only in the context of the contingency of $3.3 billion which is the usual figure and which would be included in the $6.6 billion. It will be, and will have been available. If the contingency amount had not been exempted, then the borrowing authority would have to have been requested earlier in the year. For example, last year the borrowing authority was requested on April 5 or 6, and sometimes it is requested even before the end of March.

In terms of the availability of the actual borrowing authority, Senator Smith is quite correct in that the total borrowing authority will amount to the $3.3 billion that has been used up to now, and which has not been used, plus the $6.6 billion. That is my understanding.

Senator Smith: The deputy leader has confused me, which is not very hard to do, by his comment about the contingency fund, which he said had been used, and then he went on to say that it had not been used.

I should like to clarify in my mind whether, as of now, there is an unused borrowing authority of $3.3 billion in addition to the $6.6 billion.

Senator Frith: I do not know whether the full $3.3 billion has been used. The $3.3 billion that was in the contingency for last year's borrowing authority, and which was exempted from the automatic cancellation, has been used in the meantime. For this reason we are discussing this borrowing bill at this late date. Generally speaking, we would be doing this in April rather than in June. Essentially, the $3.3 billion has been used up, and the $6.6 billion is what is required for the future.

I am sorry I did not pay particular attention to the word "unused" which the honourable senator used. I believe that sum of money has been used.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have only a few comments to make on this latest borrowing bill. As Senator Frith has pointed out, this year we will not have a single borrowing bill; we may have several or, indeed, a multitude of borrowing bills.

I would assume that the reason for the $6.6 billion, which has been requested now, is that it is the amount estimated in the budget. If that figure is as accurate as the rest of the budget figures, there can be very little doubt that we will be asked to approve another $6.6 billion and, probably, a third $6.6 billion, because the deficit keeps climbing and the new projections become more frightening each time we hear them.

The original budget figures are completely out of whack, and I can only assume that this $6.6 billion is far less than the government actually needs.

It is unfortunate that the government did not come in and ask for what it thinks it will really need, so we could examine the figures. They have not seen fit to do that, so we will have to deal with the matter in sections.

In my estimation, this is a rather unfortunate way of dealing with the public accounts of the country. I think it is not very complimentary to the Senate and, indeed, to the whole parliamentary process because Bill C-111 was placed on our desks today; it will receive second reading in this place this afternoon; and tomorrow morning there will be an emergency—in my opinion—meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to consider this borrowing authority. The bill will be reported back here tomorrow afternoon, and will receive third reading and Royal Assent, and another $6.6 billion will be tacked on to the debt of the country. All this after a cursory examination by all honourable senators who, I think, have a greater responsibility to the people of Canada than we are demonstrating in this particular instance.

In his opening remarks Senator Frith mentioned that the Financial Administration Act stipulates that statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament in order for the government to increase its outstanding debt. That is absolutely true. I rather suspect if that were not a provision of the Financial Administration Act, this government would continue to borrow without reference to Parliament at all.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): They have done it already.

Senator Doody: As Senator Roblin so aptly points out, they have not only done it already, they keep doing it and will continue to do it.

Senator Frith shakes his head in amazement and indicates that that is impossible.

Senator Frith: Not for money.

Senator Doody: They authorize and guarantee loans for private and public corporations through letters of comfort to those companies, with never a reference to Parliament. This amazing little piece of information came to light during a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in March of this year, when the minister responsible for the Treasury Board, the Honourable Donald Johnston, was defending the supplementary estimates. Those supplementary estimates included a figure of $1.3 billion as a guaranteed loan figure for Canadair. This had increased from the original estimate, of only two years before, of a guaranteed loan of $150 million. I asked Mr. Johnston how a jump of such magnitude had occurred and whether Canadair could explain the fact that this figure had jumped from $150 million to $1.3 billion in that short period of time. We were informed by the minister that this was not, indeed, the quantum jump that it appeared to be, but that, in fact, it had been increased from time to time over the intervening couple of years by comfort letters issued to the company, signed by the Minister of Finance, with the authorization of Cabinet, without reference to Parliament, the Financial Administration Act, Treasury Board, or anyone else.

Senator Frith: If they are not called on that, they must bring it into the estimates; it is not borrowing.

Senator Doody: It is not reported in the public accounts and is not demonstrated.

Senator Frith: It has nothing to do with borrowing authority.

Senator Doody: It adds to the public debt of Canada. I am saying that the evidence indicates they have found a way to get around the Financial Administration Act by not referring to Parliament. That is what they are doing with a guaranteed debt to outside companies. It seems to me that, if they can get away with it in that area, they would like to get away with it in this area as well. The fact that this bill is introduced in this chamber one afternoon and is expected to be passed the following day demonstrates to me that that is exactly what they would like to do. If they did not have to refer the matter to Parliament at all, they would be very satisfied with that system.

As it is, it is necessary to make at least this cursory presentation to the Senate and say, "Pass this this afternoon! We want to get it through committee tomorrow because the government needs this additional $6.6 billion."

● (1640)

Some honourable senators are shaking their heads about these comfort letters. They are amazing phenomena. The Honourable Donald Johnston appeared before the National Finance Committee a day or so ago with some further information about these mysterious comfort letters which nobody had heard of before. It appears that the minister is familiar with at least two such letters, one of which was issued to Canadair.

Canadair had borrowed some $822 million to the end of 1981, of which $150 million had been authorized by the Parliament of Canada through a loan guarantee. The difference between the $150 million and the $822 million had been arranged through comfort letters issued by the Minister of Finance, with no reference to the Parliament of Canada.

If the Parliament of Canada is not to have control of the public purse, then dismiss it, send it home, and forget this farce completely, because control of the public purse is by far the most important function of the parliamentary system, as is avowed.

de Havilland Aircraft of Canada has borrowed $70 million on the basis of a comfort letter issued on December 4, 1976, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for the production of the Dash-7 aircraft. The letter of comfort, with an expiry date of December 31, 1980, was extended to September 1981, at which time it was no longer required. Appropriation Act No. 4 of 1980-81 authorized the guarantee of loans to de Havilland to a limit of $450 million. Therefore, from December 24, 1976, until the Loan Guarantee Act of 1980-81, de Havilland Aircraft was operating on a line of credit which was authorized by comfort letters issued by the minister without reference, once again, to the Parliament of Canada.

The Honourable Mr. Johnston, in his testimony before us, announced the fact that he felt that the issuance of the comfort letters was inappropriate. He felt that that was not the right way to go about the financing of companies, and that the public purse should not be handled in that manner. He has undertaken to obtain for us a list of outstanding comfort letters, indicating the dates and the amounts. I look forward to seeing that list in order to determine just exactly how much use or abuse of this particular system has taken place over the years.

This is a matter entirely different from the issuing of Governor General's warrants when Parliament is not sitting. There was a whole set of rules and regulations for the issuance of Governor General's warrants—Parliament must not be sitting, the government must report the warrants within three days after the commencement of the sitting of Parliament, and so on. At least, these are the rules applying to the provincial legislatures, and I assume that those applying to the national legislature are much the same.

In any event, I must say, honourable senators, that I was shocked when I discovered this situation. It is, in my estimation, at least, a complete violation of the Financial Administration Act and should be brought to the attention of the public.

Regarding this borrowing bill, I think that if the Financial Administration Act were not in place, it is quite likely that the government would find some other means of borrowing money, also without reference to Parliament. We could ask the honourable Senator Frith what this particular $6.6 billion is to be used for, but I do not suppose that would be very productive, because there are so many uses to which it could be put that the $6.6 billion is obviously not enough to handle them all. For example, the buying of a chain of service stations across Canada would account for quite a large sum of the Canadian debt; the one-billion-four-hundred-fifty-million-dollar purchase price for Petrofina—that grand bunch of Canadian dollars shipped out of the country—is surely a contributor to the resultant mess that the economy is now in.

The mindless and uncontrolled financial and energy policies of this government are reflected in the terrible state of affairs that we now have before us. The numbers—and I suppose that honourable senators are tired of listening to the numbers—illustrate that mess. We heard a lot of explanations on the plight of the dollar today, to the effect that there is really nothing wrong with the Canadian dollar, it is just that the American dollar is so strong.

Senator Roblin: That's a new one.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that is certainly a very positive way of approaching a very negative situation. I marvel at the mental agility of the honourable members of the government to be able to come up with these irrational rationalizations of this absolutely weird and wonderful situation we find ourselves in.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Just stay non-partisan, now.

Senator Doody: I am here for very partisan reasons, honourable senators. It is extremely difficult not to be partisan when we look across at the smiling face of the Leader of the Government. I have only to thank my good sense and good judgment in joining the Conservative Party when I did. Otherwise I might have found myself in the unfortunate position of being on that side of the house. How could I have lived with myself under these circumstances? I would not have been able to; I would have had to cross the floor.

The interest on the national debt is something that honourable senators should think about: $16.6 billion a year, $1,750 per taxpayer, $680 per capita in interest on the national debt.

At present, $6.6 billion is being requested; perhaps another $6.6 billion will be requested in a few weeks' time, and then another $6.6 billion as the months go by. Meanwhile, the people of Canada, the investment community, and the business community nationally and internationally will continue to lose confidence in the country and in the government. So it goes, honourable senators; the snowball gets bigger and the panic becomes greater. The only real cure for this situation is not another borrowing bill; the only real cure for it is another election. It is time for the government across the way to recognize the fact that it is completely out of control of the situation in Canada. It is time to ask the people to make up their minds whether they want to continue on this downhill course—this idiocy—or whether they want to change the government.

If that is not partisan, honourable senators, I cannot imagine what could be, but it is also very sincere and, I think, reasonably accurate. The interest rates are absolutely crippling the public of Canada, but we are told that that is the fault of the Government of the United States. Inflation is certainly not nearly under control, although progress is being made in that regard in the United States. We are told that this, however, is not the fault of the Government of Canada; it is the unions' fault. We are told that the national energy policy, which has gone completely out of whack upon the closing down of all of the major projects that we were led to believe would be our salvation—the Alsands and the pipeline, which is postponed for two years and maybe forever—is not the fault of the Government of Canada; it is the fault of the provinces; they would not co-operate. Premier Lougheed did all of that, we are told this afternoon.

So it goes, and so this government cannot control it. If all of these problems are somebody else's fault and the government has no way of controlling them and will take no responsibility for them, let it get out and pass the job on to somebody else to have a go at it.

In any event, honourable senators, you probably gather from my comments today that I am not going to support the borrowing bill. I would not give this government 6.6 cents to spend, not to mention $6.6 billion. I think it is a completely irresponsible government. Honourable senators may rest assured that I will vote against the borrowing bill, and any other bill, of course, that the government brings in, with the possible exception of the one that was just introduced by my friend, Senator Stollery.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Government rise, I would like to say that there was an examination made of the comfort letters in the National Finance Committee. It was an issue that was raised by Senator Doody and, on behalf of the committee and perhaps on behalf of the Senate, I would like to thank him for the assiduous way in which he pursued the examination and adduced some very interesting information, as well as an undertaking—or what I take to be an undertaking—from the President of the Treasury Board that this situation will be rectified and reported upon.

The point in Senator Doody's speech to which I really wanted to refer is the fact that we are rushing this borrowing bill through. It is my understanding that if the bill receives second reading it will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

In the case of the comfort letters, which was raised by Senator Doody, a detailed examination was made of that subject. The hearing was brought to a conclusion by the members of the committee, not by the chairman or, in that case, the deputy chairman, and it has been the tradition in the Finance Committee that ample time is given to its members, including those of the opposition, to examine every detail they wish to examine, of a bill or matter that is before the committee.

● (1650)

If Senator Doody is concerned as to whether or not this bill will be examined adequately, he may be assured that if the bill receives second reading here today, the committee will meet in room 256-S at 9.30 tomorrow morning and he and the members of the committee will be given every opportunity to examine the contents of the bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, may I just reply to the comments of the chairman of the National Finance Committee? I thank him for them, and for the information he has given us.

One of the reasons for my irritation on this particular subject is that I will not be able to be here tomorrow. We have a Northern Pipeline Committee expedition out to an ice tank testing facility here. We are looking at ways and means of solving the cold water navigation problems which are so close to the hearts of all Newfoundlanders now that our offshore resources are going to be—excuse the expression—exploited.

If I can split myself in two, I will certainly take advantage of the opportunity to learn more in the National Finance Committee.

Senator Flynn: I have just a few questions. The first of these, of course, relates to the comments made by Senator Everett, as well as to those of Senator Doody just before he resumed his seat.

My understanding is that the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of State (Finance), would like to have this bill receive royal assent tomorrow. The point that Senator Doody was making, therefore, was not by way of any criticism of the National Finance Committee. If there were no rush of this kind, I am quite sure that Senator Everett would agree to have his committee meet only next week, in order to accommodate honourable senators, and not rush the bill through tomorrow.

I think the deputy leader owes it to the Senate to tell us the reasons why the government wants this bill to receive royal assent tomorrow. Is it necessary in order to arrange for a bond issue right away, or will it make any difference if the bill receives royal assent only next week?

My second question concerns the next borrowing authority that we shall receive during the course of this year. I understand that the $6.6 billion requested under this bill was calculated at the time of the budget in November 1981. Apparently, on the basis of what we heard this morning, the government is expecting a deficit of $16 billion. In the light of that, what would be the additional amount that the government would require under the next borrowing authority bill?

Finally, I have a technical question which deals with clause 2(3) of this bill, which states:

(3) For greater certainty, any amount borrowed under this section or any other authority conferred by Parliament before the coming into force of this section may be borrowed in a currency other than that of Canada and may be repaid in the currency in which it was borrowed.

The deputy leader said that the purpose of this subclause is to clarify the problem, once and for all. It seems strange to me, however, that there should be a subclause in this bill which deals only with the authority for this year, and indeed, only for a part of this year, rather than by means of an amendment to the Financial Administration Act, or by means of a separate clause in this bill. This authority is going to be lost once the bill is exhausted, and it will be really difficult to find authority for the government to retain the power to borrow in any kind of currency, as is provided here. This is certainly a very technical defect, but it is an important one.

I would like to know if the deputy leader has something to say about this, and if he would inform the Senate accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to comment, if I may, on this matter of speed.

I quite agree with Senator Everett, as a member of his committee for quite a few years, that it is his habit, unfailingly, to provide, within the limits of his powers, full opportunity to members of his committee to examine whatever matter may be before them; but if he is under the constraint of being required, insofar as one can require a chairman to do anything within a certain time, to report this bill tomorrow or the next day, it seems to me very difficult to understand how the members of the committee are going to have time sufficiently to inform themselves to conduct the adequate examination before this committee that they ought to be able to.

Consequently, I would like to add my protest against this business of authorizing the government to borrow $6.6 billion on the basis of a bill that was put on my desk, at least, an hour ago, and is expected to get third reading tomorrow. That seems to be an extraordinary situation. It is not as though this government, which does seem to stumble along from day to day and minute to minute, did not, long since, have sufficient knowledge of what it was going to require in this respect, and to introduce this bill into the Commons and get it through the Commons in time to allow the Senate, as well as the Commons, a full opportunity to examine it, and the reasons behind it, after being able to inform themselves as to the factors which it is necessary to understand in order to know whether or not they should report the bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to deal first with the intervention of Senator Doody, and the first and major part of his concerns that were shared by Senator Smith and Senator Flynn.

I can understand why the borrowing authority, which is so closely connected to the budget, can raise criticism of the budget along with the general financial policies of the government; but the borrowing authority bill itself is really a technical follow-up to the budget.

There are, basically, two sources of funds that the government can turn to in order to implement its budget and its statutory requirements: the borrowing authority; and supply. I cannot agree that there is anything extraordinary about this, as Senator Smith and Senator Doody have implied. I do not mean to suggest that the observations made by Senator Doody were in any way out of order, because there is another opportunity in this connection to deal with the government's financial policies; but the borrowing authority last year was dealt with in exactly the same way as it is being dealt with this year. I wanted to check back on how it has been done in the past, and I do not want to suggest that it is purely routine.

An Hon. Senator: $6.6 billion—purely routine?

Senator Frith: The point is that the $6.6 billion in itself is not routine; it is part of the budget that has been duly debated and questioned. The point I am making is that once any government comes to a budgetary figure it has to get its borrowing authority and its supply in order to proceed.

From what I can determine—and I did go back to previous governments—this was the procedure used by them. In other words, what should be examined with regard to the borrowing authority is the budget. Perhaps this is a bad procedure. Certainly, for as long as I have been here, the lengthy debate that takes place on government economic policies does not usually take place at the borrowing authority stage, because if its budget passes, then the government must have the borrowing authority to implement its provisions. Similarly, it asks for supply for the same reasons.

● (1700)

All I can say is that it is not appropriate to criticize the suggestion that the borrowing authority bill receive second reading and go to committee, and that it be reported back from committee, when that same committee has dealt with the estimates and supplementary estimates, and when another committee has dealt with budget questions. The borrowing authority, as such, is traditionally dealt with in that way. It was dealt with in that way last year; it was referred to committee, and received third reading the next day.

It is not really a matter of tacking on $6.6 billion to the debt. As it traditionally does, the government, in this bill, is asking for authority to borrow, and its authority to borrow depends on the Financial Administration Act. It is not getting around that act; it is asking for authority, as any government must do under the Canadian parliamentary system, no matter what its party affiliation is, in order to have the authority to borrow, to govern and to implement its economic policies.

I do not know how I can deal with the allegation concerning what the government would like to do. It seems to me that the question of comfort letters is not relevant to this question of the borrowing authority, unless the government will be asking someone to give it comfort letters.

Senator Roblin: By George, it could use a few!

Senator Frith: I am not prepared to deal with the question of comfort letters here because I do not think it is relevant. Having heard only Senator Doody's side in connection with this matter, I can easily share some of his chagrin. However, if I understood his explanation correctly, it seems to me that a comfort letter is something that applies when the government is lending money or, at least, is supporting someone in a lending posture rather than a borrowing posture. It seems to me that if the bill goes to committee the question of comfort letters can be pursued, as to whether they have anything to do with a borrowing authority bill. I am not convinced that they do. Perhaps in committee tomorrow I will be convinced that comfort letters are an integral part of a borrowing authority bill.

Senator Flynn asked why the government wanted the bill to pass tomorrow, and whether there was any particular magic in its being passed tomorrow, whether it was because it was the day after Joyce's "Bloomsday", or the day after "Ulysses" was written, or whether it was because it was Senator Roblin's birthday. Certainly, we would be pleased to wish him a happy birthday on third reading, if we are able to obtain it.

Honourable senators, there is no particular magic in its passing tomorrow. We have asked the committee to sit tomorrow to examine the bill and to report it tomorrow if it is able to do so. A similar procedure was followed last year. I pointed out earlier that this is a fairly ordinary way of doing it; that it is done within a short time. I am not suggesting that it is always done in one day.

Senator Flynn: Will it make any difference if third reading takes place next week?

Senator Frith: All I can say is that the minister has asked me to ask the Senate to give the bill third reading tomorrow, so that we can have royal assent. It may have something to do with the fact that two Thursdays and Fridays will be non-sitting days in the other place, although they are normally sitting days. I cannot justify it on any basis, except that the government has asked for the borrowing authority. I am not saying that all is lost if the bill does not receive third reading tomorrow. On the other hand, I cannot see that a great deal will be gained if the committee makes its report tomorrow and we do not have third reading tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: If you tell me that the minister is in urgent need of this legislation—

Senator Frith: If I do not know that that is so, then I will not say it is so. I am simply saying that if the bill goes to committee tomorrow, and if it is reported tomorrow without amendment, then, just as there is no overpowering need to give it third reading and royal assent tomorrow, there does not seem to be any overpowering reason not to.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could question the minister and give us a reply tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I will try to do so. However, I suspect that the answer I will give will be the one I am giving now, namely, that I cannot see any reason why it should receive third reading or any reason why it should not receive third reading tomorrow, given those conditions.

Concerning the amount required by way of additional borrowing authority, I cannot give any figures other than the ones referred to by Senator Flynn, because, of course, these are estimates that we have read and heard about. We shall not have any more accurate perception of that until we know the contents of the statement to be made by the minister.

Senator Flynn: Was it not based on a $10 billion deficit?

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question that I wanted to ask earlier, but I seemed to get a little crowded out. The Deputy Leader of the Government gave us a good explanation of the sums involved, but I did not perceive a comparison between the figures for this spring and for a year ago. I believe the $3.3 billion was the unborrowed portion of the previous amount. The Deputy Leader of the Government said that normally it would have come on March 31. Now it is $6.6 billion, and this is June. How does this compare with the situation a year ago?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Regarding the difference between the March and June figures, the approximate amount of $3.3 billion was contained in the contingency amount for previous years. In previous years, if that contingency was not used, then, by reason of the Financial Administration Act, it was an unused borrowing authority, and so it disappeared. This last year, 1981-82, exempted the contingency figure from the automatic cut-off, from the automatic guillotine. So that $3.3 billion, not having been guillotined, existed as an authority to be used until today.

Senator Molson: What did they borrow last year when the amount was cut off?

Senator Frith: I do not know the amount of the borrowing authority for last year, but I can look it up or we can get it in committee tomorrow. If we do not get the figure in committee tomorrow, then I will certainly provide it.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: It is $12 billion.

Senator Frith: According to the deputy chairman of the committee, the figure is $12 billion.

The question asked by Senator Flynn underlines the fact that what is being asked for here is $6.6 billion in the previous amount, and there is no authority given for any additional amount. If clause 2(3) of this bill intends to clarify, once and for all, the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in funds other than Canadian currency, it does not succeed in doing so. As I understand it, that subclause is there temporarily, not to solve the problem but until an amendment can be made to the Financial Administration Act to solve the problem.

Senator Flynn: It says in part, "any other authority conferred by Parliament". That covers the Financial Administration Act and any future bills.

Senator Frith: But only those dealing with borrowing authority.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but it is really a general amendment, and I do not see how you find it there.

Senator Frith: It seems to me that clause 2(3) will not live past, or ought not to live past, or should not be interpreted as living past, March 31, 1983. In the meantime it is hoped that the Financial Administration Act will be amended to cover that point.

Senator Flynn: You will not need it, because you will lose this subclause somewhere, somehow.

Senator Frith: I hope not, but perhaps someone can also give us some help on that matter tomorrow.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on second reading of this bill. I commend it to you, and if it is adopted on second reading, I will—

Senator Flynn: Do you have any doubt?

Senator Frith: That is a famous Hobson's choice. If I say, "when it is adopted," someone will say, "Don't take that for granted"; and when I say, "if it is adopted," someone asks,

"Do you have any doubt?" In any event, if it is adopted, I will suggest that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for study and report before third reading. I can tell honourable senators that there is a meeting of that committee planned for tomorrow morning at 9.30, at which time there will be room on the committee's agenda for this item.

Senator Smith: I wonder if the deputy leader would mind responding to another question. As I followed him, he was saying that there is nothing extraordinary about the timing of this bill, or the time allowed between its introduction and the date on which it is hoped to be passed, and that everything is just as it has always been.

I wonder if his research into that situation led him to examine also whether we have ever been faced with such a bill when the budget itself had never been passed into law. In this case, seven months, or thereabouts, have expired since the budget was placed before Parliament, and, I believe, 24 changes have already been made to what was in the budget the night it was presented; and the deputy leader himself says that we will not really know the final figures on the budget until we get another statement from the Minister of Finance.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my research definitely never disclosed a situation parallel to the situation described by Senator Smith. That is why, it seems to me, it is important to underline the fact that what is being asked for here is the borrowing authority, and I think honourable senators can be sure that, no matter what takes place in terms of other changes, it will be no less than $6.6 billion. So, the honourable senator's point is well taken. The precedent does not exist and this is an unusual situation. But if, for example, much more speculative figures were included, I would agree with him that it would be very relevant to the asking for such speedy passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator van Roggen:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa, namely Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, Libya, Egypt, Sudan, Israel, Lebanon, Jordan, Syria, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, North and South Yemen, Oman the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Kuwait and Iran;

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the Committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the Committee may determine; and

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have had time to read the long list of countries, and it will be an interesting trip through all these countries.

Hon. George van Roggen: If I may, I would like to clarify the fact that those countries are only named for the purpose of delineating the boundaries of the area with which we are concerned. In the ten years I have been a member of this committee, including my time under the chairmanship of Senator Aird, I have taken only two trips—one to Washington and one to Brussels—so I do not think that we shall be abusing our privileges in this instance.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is not Senator van Roggen's "Sunflight"!

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 17, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT ON COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the supplementary budget of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

June 17, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred Bill C-111, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority" has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, June 16, 1982, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, under the rules, the report of a committee reporting a bill without amendment stands adopted. However, Senator Everett wishes leave to make a brief statement and, on his behalf, I ask that he be permitted to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I wish to make one point that came out in the course of the committee's examination of Bill C-111. This bill seeks supplementary borrowing authority in the amount of $6.6 billion. It is not unlike Bill

C-59, which we considered last year, in which a request was made for supplementary borrowing authority in the amount of $14 billion. At that time $11 billion of that authority was to expire, if unused, on March 31, 1982. Of that amount, $3 billion would not expire in the event that it was not used. Therefore, as of March 31, 1982, the unused portion of the $11 billion that had been authorized under Bill C-59 expired and the government proceeded to operate with new borrowings under the $3 billion contingency amount that did not expire on March 31, 1982.

When the committee was involved in the examination of this bill, we found that this contingency amount was not $3 billion but $3.6 billion, and that approximately $600 million had been in that "unexpiring" category since the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978. Therefore, it made us wonder whether Parliament was losing some control over supplemental borrowing. In questioning, we found that the $3.6 billion that existed as at March 31, 1982, has been reduced by borrowings to approximately $1 billion as of this date.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): One billion dollars?

Senator Everett: Yes; $1 billion of the $3.6 billion is left, less an amount borrowed for foreign exchange purposes since June 1. The reason for that is that the government does not report its borrowings for foreign exchange purposes immediately; it generally reports those amounts at the end of the month. So there is a period between June 1 and the present time in which the government has probably been borrowing fairly heavily, which borrowings will reduce the $1 billion.

We received an assurance from the witnesses that the amount that is left—that is, the $1 billion of the $3.6 billion that existed as of May 31, which has been reduced by the foreign exchange borrowings since May 31—remains a contingency amount. While the $6.6 billion that we are authorizing here will expire on March 31, 1983, the amount that is left over of that $3.6 billion will not expire.

It is true that the government will be coming back for further supplemental borrowing authority during this fiscal year because the deficit is larger than was expected in the budget, and the borrowing requirements on account of that deficit, and possibly on account of foreign exchange, will be larger than was initially thought.

We asked the witnesses to inform the Minister of Finance that at that time we would like whatever contingency amount is required to be renewed and that all other contingency amounts be cancelled. That has not been the case, and, as a result of that, $600 million has been carried as a contingency amount going back to 1978. We consider that they should cancel all contingency amounts at that time and then renew with a contingency amount, which they require during periods when Parliament is not sitting, or when there is an election, or when there is a serious foreign exchange problem, which we are in right now—in other words, cancel all previous contingency amounts and establish a new contingency amount each year.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

June 17, 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. Z. Estey, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of June, 1982, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be

Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO RECEIVE PRESENTATION FROM CANADIAN RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES' PENSION ASSOCIATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to report that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and

[Senator Everett.]

Communications has been requested by the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association to hear representations from that association. The committee feels that it should hear those representations, should the Senate so authorize.

In pursuance thereof, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, in response to a request from the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association, be authorized to receive a presentation from representatives of that association with respect to certain issues relating to the Canadian National Railways Pension Trust Funds and, if the committee considers it necessary, to report thereon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to vote in favour of the motion, but before so doing, would Senator Smith tell us how this request arose and what it is essentially about?

Senator Smith: This association has been active with reference to pensions of various former employees of various railways. From year to year that association has made a request of this committee to make representations. We have heard them several times in the past.

Representatives made this latest request a few days ago. They were informed that the committee would seek permission of the Senate to hear their representations, and, in pursuance of that undertaking, I have moved this motion today. This is not an unusual request. Their brief is a rather lengthy one but, in essence, it makes the representation that the pension funds should be invested in a way which would be more advantageous to the pensioners.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Ernest G. Cottreau, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Buckwold be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Now I am worried.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is overdue.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATEADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 21, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could inform us at this point whether he has a list of bills the government would like to see passed before the summer recess—if it is still expected to start on June 30?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think this is a good opportunity to give a preview of the bills we can expect in the Senate during the coming weeks. I may be able to obtain further information for the sitting on Monday evening at eight o'clock. I would also like to point out that for the next two weeks, we shall be meeting on Monday at eight o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: But you do not have a list, and according to the Order Paper, we only have Bills C-108 and C-10. This is legislation the government would probably like to have passed by Parliament before the summer recess. But what are the other bills? Are you going to tell us Monday?

Senator Frith: Yes, I have some notes here in a book, but I would like to have a chance to update them for next week, when I would be able to give a more complete list.

Senator Flynn: You are going to give us the list Monday?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is exactly what I have agreed to do.

Senator Flynn: All right.

Motion agreed to.

● (1415)

[English]

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. What about Tuesday?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, next week we shall sit on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, on Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and on Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, but not on Thursday or Friday.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMYPOSSIBLE STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—CONSEQUENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether or not we can expect any legislation to be brought in following upon Mr. MacEachen's financial statement.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since that will depend on a cabinet decision, I will pass the ball to my colleague, Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The universe will unfold in due course.

Hon. G. I. Smith: If it does not collapse first.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He told you what to say.

Senator Perrault: Surely, you do not expect that kind of question to be answered.

NATIONAL REVENUEALLEGED DELAY IN PROCESSING INCOME TAX RETURNS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The employees of the Department of National Revenue have been directed to delay processing income tax returns that require a refund payment because the federal government apparently does not have the necessary funds to make the tax repayments. When does the minister anticipate that this directive will be rescinded and refunds made?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator's question is hardly designed to inspire confidence in the strength of the Canadian economy. In that sense, I feel it is somewhat irresponsible. This government is not in dire economic straits which deserve those kinds of comments.

Hon. Jack Marshall: But the people are.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator has some specific support for his allegations, I shall be pleased to pursue the matter further with the department he named.

● (1420)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the lack of confidence in the Canadian economy is due to the actions of the cabinet, of which my honourable friend is a member.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: It is not due to any question from this side of the chamber.

I would ask the honourable minister if, when he follows up on this information, he could also tell us how many income tax returns requiring refunds have yet to be processed. I realize that he does not have the information at his fingertips, but I do not think it would take him any more than two months to get it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice. The Honourable Senator Phillips is aware, of course, that the preparation of that answer will take a good deal of time, person-hours and money. However, if the resources necessary to find the answer to the question can be located, we will certainly obtain a reply.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. For several weeks the government has been promising it would make a statement on the country's economic situation and that perhaps some remedies or solutions for our economic problems would be announced. We were told: Wait until Versailles; after Versailles, everything will be settled. When the Versailles Summit was over, the Minister of Finance returned to Canada, and we were told: Wait for the Prime Minister, he has all the answers in his back pocket, and he will announce them as soon as he gets here. When the Prime Minister got back, he was asked whether he really had specific ideas as to how the economic situation should be remedied. We were told: Wait, because we are going to have a cabinet meeting, followed by a meeting of the Liberal caucus, and then you will get the answers.

Meanwhile, 1,200,000 Canadians are unemployed. The dollar has fallen to 77 cents and a fraction of a cent, the Bank of Canada has increased the bank rate again today—

Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Asselin: Interest rates are absolutely unreasonable. I know it hurts, but be patient!

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: It was the same under Diefenbaker!

Senator Asselin: It was not as bad under Diefenbaker, I can tell Senator Lamontagne that. Meanwhile, the government has offered no solutions at all. One would think we would have a mini-budget before the summer recess, but the Minister of Finance said that it was out of the question. How can a minister responsible for economic affairs afford to sleep—

Senator Lamontagne: He is not asleep!

Senator Asselin: —when the country's economy is an utter disaster?

Could the minister inform us whether at the end of this session, Canadians can at least expect from their government an economic policy that might be able to help them get out of the present recession?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, although my honourable friend certainly has the right to express his opinions, it is my view that Question Period is not the time to enter into a mini-debate.

[Senator Phillips.]

In reply to the question, which was only somewhat related to the speech that preceded it, I will say that when the Minister of Finance is ready to announce a date for his economic statement, I am sure he will do so. I guarantee to my honourable friend that I will carry that message to him as quickly as I can.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Yes, but the minister should understand that the Canadian people and Canadian businessmen have been waiting for six months to hear an announcement on the country's economic problems by the Minister of Finance.

We were told: Wait until the Versailles Summit, which is going to provide all the answers; the Prime Minister will take care of all that when he gets back.

Is the cabinet asleep? Are you going to do something about the problems the country is now facing and are you finally going to come up with some answers? When is it going to be?

[English]

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, the Cabinet is not asleep. I say that in reply to the only new element of the second speech made by my honourable friend.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, so you cannot sleep?

Senator Olson: No, we do not sleep.

● (1425)

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Will the Minister of State for Economic Development tell the Senate at what percentage the Bank of Canada rate was fixed today?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I believe it was set at 16.59 per cent.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Terrible!

Senator Murray: Is the minister in a position to state whether the principal reason for the bank rate increase today is to bolster the Canadian dollar which, I understand, closed yesterday at less than 78 cents, and was trading at noon today at 77.65 cents, vis-à-vis the United States dollar?

Senator Olson: Although I do not have this in writing from the Governor of the Bank—and I am not sure that he does this each week—I would expect, from my own personal analysis of the situation, that the bank rate is up this week in response to a significant rise in the bank rate in the United States this week—indeed, earlier than this week.

We discussed this in some detail yesterday, and all of the answers I gave then are equally valid today.

Senator Murray: Is it the position of the minister and the government that the minute that interest rates in the United States begin to fall, the bank rate here will begin to fall?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that it is that automatic, that it will be that instant, because there are a number of factors that are obviously taken into account.

It is the position of this government, as long as we are going to have an open economy with the flow of funds into and out of Canada, that we need to have a monetary policy that corresponds to that freedom.

PROJECTED DATE OF RECOVERY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development.

On the basis of its composite indicator at the end of March, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce has projected economic recovery no earlier, and possibly later, than the fourth quarter of 1982.

My question is a very simple and straightforward one. Does this differ from the government's assessment of when recovery will begin to take place?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there have been a number of prognostications of when there may be some upturn in the economy. I think there is, perhaps, a preponderance of prognosticators now who think there could be some mild, gentle or slight upswing going into the third quarter of 1982. On the balance of those prognostications, it is not viewed as being a particularly significant upswing.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. It is the practice of the minister, when he answers our questions, to take exception to our use of private forecasts as to what the future may hold, and regularly we try to get up-to-date figures from the government itself, but they are seldom if ever—in fact, I would say almost never—forthcoming.

Despite the fact that the Minister of Finance has himself admitted on a piecemeal basis that many of his assumptions of late November have proven to be inaccurate, can the minister now tell us, without undertaking to bring anything to the Senate, or can he at least reassure us, that the government has its own updated economic assumptions?

If the government is not relying on material provided by those in its own employ, has it any private forecasts on which it relies?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is correct when he recalls that the Minister of Finance has indicated that there have been changes in the performance of the Canadian economy that would lead to some differences between many of the indicators now and those at the time of his budget forecasts of November 1981.

● (1430)

I do not take the time to object to the use by honourable senators opposite of private forecasts, and that sort of thing, because in spite of the objections I have made in the past they continue to do this. The preamble to my honourable friend's question was, again, a reference to a report of an economic projection by some bank or other private organization, but I will not object. However, with regard to the other part of his question as to whether the government has an updated statement and list of projections available, I have to tell him that that will come along with the statement of the Minister of Finance on the economy, whenever he announces the date, which, as we all know, will be relatively soon.

PUBLIC WORKS

NOVA SCOTIA—NORTH SYDNEY—DILAPIDATED STATE OF FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to return to the more mundane but nevertheless quite important subject of employment.

On June 9, I posed a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government with regard to creating employment by undertaking the repair of the federal building in North Sydney, Nova Scotia. If that were done then, at least, the civil servants working there would not have to dodge the drops of rain coming in through the roof that is leaking so badly.

At the time I asked the question Senator Frith said, in response to my comment, that the building was constructed in 1958, that he is in as good shape now as he was in 1958, and I believe that. His roof may be a little thinner on top, and so on, but I really believe that he is in good shape.

In any event, he said he would dig into this matter and see what would happen. I wonder if he has any further information in this connection. It is quite important. I would also like to know whether, in the future, buildings of this kind are going to be maintained by the Department of Public Works or by Canada Post. I appreciate that the deputy leader probably does not have the information at this moment, but I would be obliged if he would produce it as soon as possible.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I remember the question. I do not have a report from the Department of Public Works yet, but when I send a further request for it I will add the other question the honourable senator has asked.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIR TRANSPORT COMMAND—AVAILABILITY OF AIRCRAFT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with reference to the question asked by Senator Lafond on May 13 concerning the procurement of airliners, the question and inherent suggestion, indicating that a large number of airliners is available at very attractive prices, is a valid observation. Indeed, were it possible for the Department of National Defence to avail itself of this unprecedented situation, it would likely be an ideal time to procure a strategic air transport fleet in sufficient numbers to meet all Canadian Forces commitments.

The Department of National Defence has been aware of this opportunity and is currently investigating the possibility of taking advantage of this exceptional source of procurement. Such a purchase, however, could only be pursued following an examination and an adjustment of the department's priorities, in view of the many programs competing for the limited funds in the capital budget.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RELOCATION OF OFFICE IN LONDON, ENGLAND

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now have a reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall on June 3 regarding the transfer of the veterans affairs division of our high commission in London from Canada House to Macdonald House.

Over the past decade, the Department of External Affairs gradually moved almost all of the line and functional operations of the high commission to Macdonald House because of the space limitations of Canada House. With the exception of the veterans affairs office, Canada House now contains only the cultural, public affairs and travel promotion programs of the high commission, and its operation is, in concept, that of a Canadian cultural centre. The transfer of the Veterans Affairs office is the final step in this process. It is required because of the expanding needs of the other Canada House programs.

A further consideration has been the need for the high commission to prepare for the future. At present, only Mr. Towgood and Mrs. Watson of the veterans affairs division have any knowledge of that division's operations. This change will enable personnel in the consular division to familiarize themselves with the veterans affairs division workload and files so that continued services can be guaranteed when Mr. Towgood is away, as well as after he decides to retire.

While Canada House is better known to the public, Macdonald House is equally accessible and provides the additional benefits of proximity to the immigration, passport and consular programs, as well as 24-hour access. There should be little, if any, inconvenience to veterans and their dependants. The necessary steps will be taken to ensure they are aware of the change.

Although there is no British Rail station nearby, Macdonald House is as close to the Bond Street tube as is Canada House to Charing Cross. Bus service is also nearby on both Oxford and Davies streets.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our embassy in Beirut continues to advise Canadians who may be at risk in the current situation to move to safer areas of the country.

Thirty-five Canadians and three returning residents were assisted in leaving Lebanon aboard the French ship Azur which arrives in Toulon tomorrow, June 18. In their latest report today the embassy staff mentioned that they are trying to arrange for 12 other Canadians who wish to leave to do so.

Two Canadian families who have fled to Jordan from Lebanon are being assisted to return to Canada by our temporary office in Amman. Our embassy in Beirut is continuing its efforts to establish the safety of Canadians in Lebanon, whose presence has been reported by their families in Canada.

Honourable senators, recent news reports indicate that a Canadian doctor is one of a group of 50 hospital workers arrested by the Israeli defence forces in Sidon on June 12.

We can confirm that Christopher Giannu, a Canadian-Born doctor, is believed to have been working as a surgeon at a hospital in southern Lebanon at the time of the Israeli invasion.

Our embassy officials in Tel Aviv have been actively pressing the Israeli authorities for further information with respect to Dr. Giannu since they first became aware of the media report on June 16. They have been given no information as yet.

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the current policy position of the Canadian government with respect to Lebanon is as follows:

We deplore the use of force in Lebanon. We oppose all acts of terrorism but we do not believe that the present Israeli military activities are justified, or that they will provide long-term security for the Israeli people.

We hope the ceasefire between Israel and Syria will hold and that a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization can be consolidated.

We continue to support the Security Council resolution of June 6 calling for an immediate ceasefire and unconditional and immediate Israeli withdrawal.

Honourable senators, the Canadian government is concerned about the displacement and suffering of the people in Lebanon as a result of the present hostilities. It has announced a contribution of $1 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross for immediate relief.

The Canadian government will be keeping developments under review and, as the situation warrants, it will consider further contributions. A number of United Nations agencies have begun responding to the Secretary-General's efforts to mobilize urgent humanitarian assistance.

Honourable senators, it is premature to indicate what the Canadian government reaction would be to a multinational force within or outside the United Nations or to Canadian participation in it if invited.

FALKLAND ISLANDS—ARGENTINE PRISONERS—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now have a brief word on the Falklands situation, as of this afternoon.

There have been reports that Canada has offered to help the British to maintain Argentine prisoners of war and to assist in their return to the mainland.

British authorities have asked Canada and other countries to use whatever influence we may have with Argentina to encourage that country to agree to grant British ships safe passage for the return of prisoners. We have instructed our ambassador in Buenos Aires to stress the humanitarian nature of our concern and the need to prevent further loss of life or suffering.

The British have not asked Canada for any direct assistance for the care of prisoners. We understand that the International Red Cross is trying to negotiate the transfer of Argentine prisoners either to Chile or Uruguay.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATION TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the motion's sponsor for some information, but since he is not present, I ask that the order be allowed to stand.

Order stands.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES—ANNOUNCEMENT OF BIRTH OF A SON

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators who have not heard the news will be delighted to learn that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales became the parents of a son a short while ago.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Mother, son and father are reported to be doing well. We have been informed that in the other place a resolution is being drawn up proposing that a message of congratulations be sent to Buckingham Palace.

I am sure that honourable senators would think it appropriate that we in this place join in any congratulation message sent from Parliament to Buckingham Palace. May I say that a copy of the message from the other place should be available shortly. Perhaps when it arrives here we can adopt a similar motion and join in the parliamentary message to Buckingham Palace on this happy occasion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It will be a pleasure to second the motion by the Leader of the Government. Indeed, on this side our sentiments entirely reflect those on the opposite side of the House.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, June 29, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[English]

He said: Honourable senators, before leave is given, and in explanation, the bill that will be the principal subject matter of the meeting for which special permission is sought is the Young Offenders Bill. Provision has been made for this further meeting of that committee which has been studying Bill C-61 for some time. As you know, the committee will be meeting tomorrow at 8.30 p.m. The particular concern of the committee—and the chairman may want to add something—is that two provincial governments and the bill's sponsor want to make representations on the bill. They will be able to attend at that time, and I believe we should give them the opportunity to make representations before the committee then.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

COMMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. My question is based on the comments of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in western Canada this weekend that the general direction of government policy in the past six months has been:

—to scare the hell out of people by creating enough unemployment and causing enough bankruptcies of small businesses that people will bring their expectations down to more realistic levels and realize that they live in a hard world, that Canada can't isolate itself from the global village.

In view of the fact that we now have 1,200,000 Canadians out of work, the Canadian dollar dropping to new lows every day, an unacceptably high rate of inflation and bankruptcies being created at record levels, will the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate what further disasters will be needed before the Right Honourable the Prime Minister is satisfied that Canadians are sufficiently frightened?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, let me begin by correcting two of the so-called assertions that have been attributed to the Prime Minister by Senator Murray. First of all, it is not government policy to create all these matters of economic distress. What he indicated was that that is one solution that is apparently being followed by some of our neighbours, particularly the United States now—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: —and by the Thatcher government in England some time ago. He immediately said, if my honourable friend would like to read the rest of the article—at least, the one I read included it, but some of the articles did not—"That is not my preferred position."

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That's right.

Senator Olson: He said that—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is a chosen position.

Senator Olson: —one way of reducing inflation is to have people so concerned that it starts to reduce expectations. Again, I want to repeat that immediately afterwards he said, "that is not my preferred solution." He went on to say that he would like to find a consensus in this country as to a reduction in expectations, thereby leading to a reduction in inflation. He said that all of those other things could happen if we have a consensus and some sharing within this country of that kind of problem. I am sure that Senator Murray would like to rephrase his question now that he has more accurate information as to what was said.

Senator Murray: It is not a matter of rephrasing the question; it is a matter of reading in greater detail the comments of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, as reported.

● (2015)

The Prime Minister pointed out that there were two options.

Senator Olson: Three options.

Senator Murray: I am quoting from an article in today's Ottawa Citizen, which states:

"Government interventions," he said, though not as drastic as those followed by the Reagan administration in the U.S., are designed to "scare the hell out of people" to make them realize they have to lower their expectations.

Speaking at a Western Liberal policy conference here this weekend, Trudeau stressed his government has not "completely" followed the Reagan policy as a means of combatting inflation.

"I don't think it's a very good Liberal way," he declared.

The better way, he said, is for the government to continue pressing provincial governments, business and labor to exercise voluntary wage restraint.

As he had argued in a TV interview taped in Calgary Friday night, Trudeau said all sectors of the economy must voluntarily restrain wage increases as an alternative to Reaganomics.

Controls were only imposed in 1975, he said, after two years of pressure from the provincial premiers on him to use federal emergency powers to combat inflation.

"I don't believe it is the Liberal way," the prime minister said.

The policy adopted by the Reagan administration in the U.S., squeezing the money supply and causing more unemployment, is another option, the prime minister said.

I invite the attention of the Minister of State for Economic Development and of all senators to the next quotation. The article states:

"It is to scare the hell out of people by creating enough unemployment and causing enough bankruptcies of small businesses that people will bring their expectations down to more realistic levels and realize that they live in a hard world, that Canada can't isolate itself from the global village," Trudeau said.

"It's not the way we've completely gone yet," he said, "but it is the general direction of what government intervention has been following in the last six months" since the November budget cut taxes for some Canadians.

[Senator Olson.]

I ask the minister again: What other disasters have to befall the Canadian economy—

Senator Perrault: A Conservative government!

Senator Murray: —before the Prime Minister is satisfied that he has scared the hell out of people?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is the same old story: Senator Murray has gone to great lengths to read some more statements. However, as he conveniently does, he has left out the most important part of the whole statement, and that is that there is a third option that the Prime Minister preferred. The third option may not be contained in the article the honourable senator read, but I happen to have here a transcript of the whole speech which went on for an hour.

Some Hon. Senators: Read it.

Senator Olson: The Prime Minister indicated that there are three options. The first option is control, and he went on to explain some of the difficulties related to that and the lack of total effectiveness of the end result of that. He went on to point out that you can have this kind of distress, and that that does scare the hell out of people.

Senator Murray: And that is the policy the government has been following for the past six months.

Senator Olson: No, it is not the policy the government has been following.

Prime Minister Trudeau went on to say that we have gone down that road for a way—

Some Hon. Senators: Down, down, down.

Senator Olson: Some senators like to cut me off in the middle of a sentence. If you want to interfere with the movement of capital in and out of this country and our dependence on international trade, which is a fact, then you get into controls.

My honourable friend continues to fail to read the whole statement, and I do not think he should get away with it this evening, tomorrow or any other day.

The preferred option, as stated very clearly by the Prime Minister, is that there should be an attempt to have a consensus by the government, the private sector and the labour sector to reduce expectations and lower interest rates so that we can all share in the difficulty that we all know occurs when there is a downturn in the economy. My honourable friend, however, has not come to that, because he wants to misinterpret the situation by stopping short of what was declared very clearly to be the preference of the Prime Minister.

● (2020)

Senator Flynn: You have not got the approval of Senator van Roggen. How can you have a consensus?

Senator Murray: I trust the minister has a transcript of the Prime Minister's interview on the Calgary television station on Friday night. I do not have one myself.

Senator Olson: You are referring to a different speech, but the content of both was the same.

Senator Murray: Then the minister will have no difficulty in finding the reference to last fall's budget in the transcript. In this connection Mr. Trudeau said, according to this article, "Some of the tax measures contained in last fall's budget were ill advised."

I see the minister shuffling through the transcript. Will he see if he can find there any identification of which policies the Right Honourable the Prime Minister finds ill advised, since this newspaper story is not precise on the point, and then, will he assure the Senate that the policies the Prime Minister considered to be ill advised are withdrawn and are no longer before Parliament?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, you don't need to thumb through anything to find the answer to that. My honourable friend knows that there have been some 22, and perhaps more, modifications to the tax laws since then. Some came out on December 18, some on other days.

Senator Asselin: You are trying to be funny now.

Senator Olson: A lot of people in this country do not find it funny at all.

Senator Asselin: You are a funny guy.

Senator Olson: I am not funny. If the government had not felt that these measures were ill advised, I expect the Minister of Finance would not have listened attentively to the people who made representations about them and would not have modified them, as this government always does when it listens to people.

Senator Flynn: He is good listener, anyway.

Senator Murray: Will the minister again check the transcript and see whether the Prime Minister has identified those who furnished this bad advice to the government? Perhaps the minister himself has some idea of who these people are, and perhaps he would care to put their names on the record.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if my friend wants to go on some kind of witch hunt to find out who it was who proposed this or that tax law, he may. The Minister of Finance, in my view, has done a very responsible thing; he has listened to the representations made to him after, as is required of him, maintaining absolute secrecy with regard to proposed new tax laws, which, of course, as my honourable friends know, is a tradition in this country and in other parliamentary democracies. When those proposed measures did see the light of day, however, and representations were made with regard to them, he introduced modifications. My honourable friend knows that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to pursue the issue as to the influences behind the budget of last fall, which my honourable friend so coyly refuses to attribute to himself.

I see in the Calgary Herald of June 1, 1982 the following heading:

Economic strategy a triumph for him, ... Olson emerges as budget's leading theoretician.

So now we know.

Senator Olson: Your colleagues are making too much noise. I did not hear what you said.

Senator Roblin: I will tell you again, though I am sure you have seen the article I referred to and may, for all I know, even have it enshrined on the notice board in your office.

It says: "Olson emerges as budget's leading theoretician". It goes on to quote part of that famous leaked document that we are all familiar with and that represented the minister's advice to his colleagues about a year ago:

"Capital investment," it said, "is key to increasing (the) level of productive activity in resource development and in industrial renewal—

• (2025)

I compare that statement, and I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to comment and to confirm that the recent surveys by the Government of Canada show that for the first time since 1968 there may be no real increase at all in investment in this current year.

While my honourable friend is thinking up the answer to that question, I would also ask him to consider the statement:

"The leading opportunity (for economic development) lies in the development of Canada's rich bounty of natural resources," the budget paper said.

I wonder whether that article is referring to the Alsands project, the Cold Lake project, the pipeline or the Beaufort Sea. I thus say to my honourable friend that I think he should rebuke the Calgary Herald for attributing to him the fact that he is the budget's leading theoretician. If he is the budget's leading theoretician, then I think we would have to blame him for everything that is in the budget, and I do not think we can do that. But I think we can point out to him that if he gave this advice to his budget colleagues, as the secret document alleges, it certainly has turned out to be a very poor bargain for him because the things he has promoted and asked for are simply nowhere to be seen.

An Hon. Senator: What he should do is resign.

Senator Roblin: He will resign one of these days, certainly, when the government is dismissed. However, I have more regard for my honourable friend than I may have indicated so far.

Senator Olson: Well, that's good.

Senator Roblin: I have regard for his common sense.

Senator Perrault: Do you have any other news clippings? You are like Harvey Kirck over there tonight.

Senator Roblin: I have all kinds. I might even have one for you, if you ask for it nicely.

The Minister of State for Economic Development also said in Calgary on June 18, I believe—that seems to be a great place to make speeches—that things look particularly difficult for people who went into debt because they did not believe there would be an end to the inflationary spiral. There is more to the article, but I shall deal with it later on. I really cannot believe that my honourable friend is the author of that statement. I give him an opportunity to deny it.

Senator Olson: My friend has been very careful, and I will not walk into the trap. I probably did say words similar to those he has just quoted, but I did not say the words to the effect that "they have never had it so good." In any event, I made some comment, and I am not complaining about the interpretation of the comment to the effect that there are a lot of people in Canada who are not carrying a lot of debt service charges who are as well off as, or are better off than, they have ever been. I do not retract that statement because it happens to be the truth as I know it.

I also said, though perhaps it was not reported, that it does not diminish in any way the concern this government has for those who are in severe economic difficulty, whatever the reason may be.

Senator Asselin: That is an advertisement.

Senator Olson: I ought to say one other thing in response to the long preamble given by my honourable friend about some advice that I am alleged to have given, assuming that if I do not respond then there was no purpose to the remarks.

Senator Roblin: I enjoy your responses; go ahead.

Senator Olson: In the first place, there must be something wrong with me and my office—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: —because I had not picked up that particular article in the Calgary Herald, but I shall ask them to bring it to my attention.

The second thing is that insofar as the wealth of Canada's natural resources and the potential of this country are concerned, I would not like my honourable friend to think, as some people in this country do—because in some cases that is where their attention is concentrated—that our great natural resources are confined to liquid hydrocarbons. This country has enormous resources in a lot of other sectors, all of which I include when I talk about economic development. We are richly endowed in natural resources in such areas as forest products, mining products, and a lot of other areas, including, but not exclusively, liquid hydrocarbons.

I can also tell my honourable friend, that the potential, or whatever word he likes to use, for the exploitation of these resources for the benefit of all Canadians has diminished somewhat in the last six to eight months. In fact, in some areas it is a very difficult and disastrous situation because of the international market demand and the price attached to it. I do not think I need spend a great deal of time explaining that there has been a downturn in expectations regarding the potential and the confidence in making the kind of investments that some eight, ten or eighteen months ago looked attractive, but which, for those reasons, are not so attractive today. I think my honourable friend is fair and reasonable enough to understand that, when the market drops off rather drastically in relation to the costs of the capital investment for the production that could have met those potential markets some time ago, there is a diminution of the optimism that could have been present about a year ago.

● (2030)

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend apparently attributed to me a charge against him that I have not yet made—I might make it now—about a statement that "the people have never had it so good." I never mentioned that; he brought it up himself. Perhaps that is bothering him. I think that phrase of his must be giving him a little difficulty now, and I would not be a bit surprised if it is.

The honourable senator leaves one with the impression that people entered deeply into debt because they did not think inflation would come to an end. The fact is, of course, that it has not yet come to an end. I suggest to my honourable friend that these people did not enter into debt because they were concerned about the ending of the inflationary spiral; they were concerned about keeping a roof over their heads; they were, and are, concerned about renewing their mortgages. How many tens of thousands of people will be renewing their mortgages this year? They are not doing so because they are looking for the end of the inflationary spiral: they are doing so because they have no other choice. What about all of the small businesses that are in the same position?

I think that my honourable friend made a mistake to speak in those terms, and the sooner he gets them out of his mind, the better.

I agree with my honourable friend when he says that it is a matter of confidence, among other things, with respect to the conduct of our economy. I agree with him when he says that natural resources include a good many things besides oil. They include mines and forests. I think he will find it rather difficult to find any more signs of life in the mining industry of this country, or, indeed, in the forest industry, than he can in the oil industry. In fact, he will probably find fewer signs of life because of the enormous layoffs we have seen in the mining and also in the pulp and paper industry. There is, however, one other natural resource that my honourable friend could have referred to; that is the people of this country.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Roblin: I am answering the points raised by my honourable friend. I think I am entitled to do that, but if I am not, I will come to an end pretty quickly.

My honourable friend is obviously on an untenable piece of ground. The natural resources of this country are, basically, the people who live in it. They have suffered the greatest damage of any in this depression which I think is now upon us. I say to my honourable friend, then, that what we are waiting for from him and his colleagues is some sign of leadership as to how we are going to get out of this morass into which they have led us. I ask him whether he can tell us when the government will be making its long awaited statement on economic renewal in Canada.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer has not changed since last week, when the same question was put to me.

Senator Roblin: What a pity!

Senator Olson: In my reply, I understood the operative part of the question to be "when." The Minister of Finance will be making an announcement very shortly.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend have any idea when he can advise this chamber that the minister will be making this announcement?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can. I will advise this chamber as soon as I know.

Senator Roblin: Will it be before the end of this month?

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance has given some indication that that is a distinct likelihood.

Senator Roblin: Will the minister give some assurance to this chamber that, when the statement comes down, there will be ample opportunity to debate it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Senate is in charge of its day-to-day proceedings. I am sure there will be ample opportunities, one way or another.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend must be aware of the fact that adjournment motions will carry if the government decides that they will.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think it would be presumptuous of me to give some indication of what the Senate may do with the hours it has between the time the statement is made and the time of an adjournment motion, which will obviously be several days and certainly many hours later. I suppose what we are getting down to is what my friend considers to be adequate. Is he talking about hours, days, or weeks as being adequate?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not know about adequacy, but I do know that some time ago we were invited by the Leader of the Government to submit a motion on the economy so that we could have a good debate on the subject. My honourable friend, Senator Phillips, did the house a service by presenting such a resolution, and not a single member of the government has risen to speak to it—not the leader of the house, not the minister, not anyone in authority.

Senator Flynn: Not even Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Roblin: I would like to know whether the members opposite do intend to take part in that debate. That would certainly help to speed things up.

Senator Flynn: Since the honourable minister is representing the western provinces, particularly the province of Alberta, does he agree with the Prime Minister when he said, in his criticism of the western Liberals for their being closet Conservatives, that the Liberal Party should go more to the left? In other words, is the minister on the side of the Prime Minister or is he on the side of Senator van Roggen?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am on the side of truth.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The truth, as I perceive it, honourable senators, is that the Prime Minister did not accuse the western Liberals of being tinged with Tory blue, as the newspapers said.

Senator Flynn: No?

Senator Olson: That would be a terrible affliction, of course.

Senator Flynn: I suppose you were cured.

Senator Olson: Yes, but having been cured, I expect there is hope for everybody.

Let us get back to the statement that has been made. There was some perception—or at least an accusation made which was, I suppose, based upon a perception—that the Prime Minister said that the Liberals in western Canada were too conservative. I was there all the time, listening very carefully, because it is my business to do so. There were some options suggested, one of which was to do what a Conservative Party might do. The Prime Minister suggested that it would be wrong to try to out-conservative the Conservatives, because that is the road to disaster.

Senator Flynn: Where do you think we are now?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we had a trial of nine months of that, after which the people decided that they did not much care for what they saw during those nine months.

Senator Flynn: Give them a chance to reconsider it.

Senator Olson: My honourable friends keep wanting another chance. The important part of all of this, however, is that the Prime Minister described another option, which Senator Murray and now Senator Flynn refuse to acknowledge, and which I am not sure was even reported quite as well as the other statement—let us be clear on that—which was the preferred position of the Prime Minister.

Senator Flynn: The honourable minister made mention earlier of consensus. How can the Prime Minister get consensus all across Canada when he cannot get it in his own party?

Senator Olson: That is the honourable senator's interpretation.

Senator Flynn: That is obvious.

Senator Olson: I can tell my friend one thing; I do not think anybody over on that side should give those on this side a lecture about consensus in our party.

Senator Flynn: We will believe you when Senator van Roggen and Senator Lamontagne say what they think about the fiscal and monetary policy and the general policy of the government, if they want to be frank.

INDUSTRY

DOME PETROLEUM LTD.—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning a Canadian who does not think he is being left out in the cold.

Is the government actually considering acquiring equity in Dome Petroleum, as has been asserted by that company's president, Jack Gallagher, at Dome's general meeting last Friday?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a positive or a negative answer to that question. If there have been discussions going on amongst cabinet ministers, my friend knows that I cannot respond. If the chief executive officer of that company, Jack Gallagher, says that some overtures have been made to the federal government, then I suppose we have to accept that they have made some overtures.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. On June 8 in a delayed answer to a question, the Minister of State for Economic Development indicated that talks had not taken place at senior levels between Dome and the government. He indicated that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last met with executives of Dome Petroleum on March 23 of this year. I take it that since June 8 there obviously have been meetings held. Could the minister confirm that that, indeed, is the case?

• (2040)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, all I can do is update my reply. The reply I gave at that time was that I had sent a request to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I will try to find out whether there have been any meetings since then. I should tell my honourable friend that I do not intend to break the oath I have taken, namely, not to report here on Cabinet meetings.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Blah, blah, blah!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 12, questions were asked by Senator Bird and Senator Marshall concerning the indexing of veterans' pensions. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has sent me a letter in reply to those questions, which I should like to read because it responds to many of the concerns voiced by honourable senators over issues concerning veterans in Canada. The letter is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and reads as follows:

I am writing in response to questions raised in the Senate by both Senator Bird and Senator Marshall, concerning the indexing of veterans' disability pensions. You had also raised a supplementary question related to the basic rate of pension.

I wish to point out that the annual indexing of veterans' pensions insofar as changes in the Consumer Price Index are concerned, has been a part of the legislation governing such pensions for some time now. Effective January 1 each year all pensions, compensation, and allowances payable from the Canadian Pension Commission are adjusted in accordance with the Consumer Price Index. Effective January 1, 1982 the increase amounted to 12.2% across the board, in accordance with Section 58.2 of the Pension Act.

In 1973, the basic rate of disability pension was set so that a pensioner without dependants, whose disabilities were assessed at 100 per cent, would receive a pension equivalent to the average salary of five selected categories of unskilled public servants, after income tax had been deducted, as if the composite employee lived in the province with the lowest income tax rate. The amount of pension paid is increased by 25 per cent if the pensioner is living with or maintaining a spouse. It is increased by 13 per cent for a first dependent child, 22.5 per cent for two dependent children, and an additional 7.5 per cent for each additional dependent child. It should be pointed out that only 24 per cent of disability pensioners in receipt of pension are actually paid at single rates. In 1978, the basic rate of pension was increased to bring it into line again with the average annual salary of the five categories of public servants.

The basic rate of pension is currently lower than the average salary of the select group of public servants. Fluctuations do occur from year to year depending on increases in salary and annual changes in the Consumer Price Index. As of January 1, 1982, the average annual salary of the five categories of public servants was $10,371. This meant that there was a difference of $46.21 a month or $554.52 per annum between the average annual salary after taxes in favour of the 100% unmarried disability pensioner, who receives $10,925.52 per annum.

Following recent wage adjustments in certain of the civil service categories used in computing the composite average salary, as of April 1, 1982, the salary after tax of the average of the five selected categories of single public servants is $988.91 a month, or $11,867 per annum, while a 100% unmarried disability pensioner receives $910.46 per month or $10,925.52 per annum, for a difference of $78.45 per month or $941.48 per year in favour of the composite public servant. A married 100% disability pensioner with no dependent children receives $1,138.08 per month or $13,656.96 per annum, whereas the married average public servant will receive $12,613.00 per year after tax for a difference of $86.99 per month or $1,043.96 per annum in favour of the disability pensioner.

As can be seen from the above statistics, the average salaries of the public servants in question are sometimes slightly higher than the unmarried 100% pensioner, and sometimes they are slightly lower. It should also be noted that, as approximately 76% of disability pensioners are married, most pensioners actually receive substantially more than the composite public servant who receives nothing extra for being married.

Both Senator Bird and Senator Marshall may be assured that close checks are kept on the relationship between the current salaries of the relevant public servants and those of disability pensioners. From year to year the differences in either direction have been minimal, but you may be assured that any time the pensioner falls behind, the feasibility of an increase, other than the Consumer Price Index increase, is considered. It should also be kept in mind that when the select categories of public servants renew their contracts, the cost of living is a prime factor in determining the amount the wages will increase. Most civil service contracts are for longer than a one year period, as well, so increases generally do not occur as frequently as would be the case of the pensioner whose pension is adjusted every year at January 1.

In closing, I would like to emphasize that I fully realize how difficult it is for some veterans to manage in these days of escalating costs. As you may know, Canadian veterans' and widows' benefits are among the most generous of any country in the world today. The legislation, nevertheless, is constantly under review to see whether ways can be found to improve the lot of veterans, their dependants, and survivors.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information concerning the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition regarding legislative business that can be expected to come before the Senate prior to the summer recess. I refer those senators who are interested to a statement made by the government house leader in the other place and reported at page 18550 of House of Commons Debates of last Thursday, June 17, 1982.

The following are the bills which I understand can be expected. First, there will be all the energy bills, which means Bills C-101 to C-108 inclusive, Bill C-112, to amend the Excise Tax Act, and Bill C-116, which is now before us.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They are all here.

Senator Frith: Yes. They are the bills which the government wishes to have passed prior to the summer recess.

As to other bills that we can expect, but which we do not yet have, there will be an appropriation bill; Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training, the subject matter of which is presently being studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science; Bill C-43, the freedom of information bill; and Bill C-110, to amend the Export Development Act. I could not find that bill in the file on my desk, but having now obtained a copy I can say that it appears to deal with the membership of the board of directors of the Export Development Corporation, and to widen and make more flexible the powers of that board.

We can also expect Bill C-92, the ports bill; and Bill C-109, dealing with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. There is the possibility of our receiving the Canada Day bill, and Bill C-53, dealing with sexual offences and the protection of young persons, which has not yet been reported from committee.

Honourable senators will understand that I cannot give a firm undertaking that they will all be received. The list I have given is the result of the inquiry I made at the request of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand that that is a list of all the bills we can expect to receive?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It depends on events.

Senator Frith: I cannot say that that is the maximum number. I believe it will be, because I cannot see how the other place can deal with more than that number of bills, particularly since there will be two Fridays when the Commons will not be sitting. Usually those Fridays are set aside for non-controversial bills. It is usually a clean-up day.

That is my best estimate, but I cannot say that it is ironclad.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: During the course of his remarks, the Deputy Leader of the Government referred to bills which the government would like passed before the summer recess. By "recess" does he mean the adjournment of this session or prorogation?

Senator Frith: I cannot say at this stage.

Senator Flynn: In any event, it will only be a recess because, according to custom, we will adjourn to the day prior to the opening of a new session.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I cannot give any reply to that question at this time because I do not know the answer.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: We don't think there will be an election.

An Hon. Senator: You hope.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

SIR WILLIAM JARDINE, CHIEF OF THE CLAN JARDINE, AND LADY ANNE JARDINE

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to draw the attention of honourable senators to the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of some distinguished visitors, in the persons of Sir William Jardine, Chief of the Clan Jardine, and Lady Anne Jardine. We take this opportunity of welcoming them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, and I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 4407.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate, and that it be the first order of the day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Why not?

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Everett: The supply bill is coming tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: That is all right. Why do you want it to be the first order of the day?

Senator Everett: I am not sure where the supply bill will be on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Flynn: It is not coming this evening, in any event.

Senator Everett: I beg your pardon?

Senator Flynn: We will not be getting the supply bill this evening.

Senator Everett: No, we will not be receiving it this evening, but we will be receiving it tomorrow. It will be placed on the Orders of the Day at that time.

Senator Flynn: I do not see why you have to have consideration of this report as the first order. It should go on the Order Paper in its proper place.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the reason I ask that it be placed on the Orders of the Day—

Senator Flynn: It will be on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: The reason I ask that it be the first item on the Order Paper—and honourable senators may not agree—is that Senator Everett is required to be out of the city tomorrow afternoon. That is why I ask to honourable senators to give him that indulgence.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He did not say that.

Senator Frith: That is one of the reasons why I ask that it be the first item on the Order Paper tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Let Senator Frith say that. If he wants our permission, he can ask for it.

Senator Everett: I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. I had spoken with the Deputy Leader of the Government and he asked me to speak to the Leader of the Opposition, but I have not had an opportunity to do so. I apologize to him for that. If the Leader of the Opposition can accommodate me, I would appreciate it very much.

Senator Flynn: For the reason given by the Deputy Leader of the Government?

Senator Everett: Fair enough, for the reason given by the Deputy Leader of the Government, if that will satisfy the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: That does not sound too convincing.
Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-103, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and to enact provisions related thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of this bill I find I cannot give it a general description, because it is probably the key bill of the eight energy bills that are before us for consideration in that it deals with the Petroleum Administration Act.

This bill amends to a considerable extent the Petroleum Administration Act, and in addition contains some new provisions. It also embodies in one or two instances the legislation flowing from certain budget resolutions which were presented quite some time ago. In this context, I am not referring to the recent budget. For those reasons, the bill is a complex one.

Basically, the bill amends the Petroleum Administration Act, and the main part of it consists of amendments to that act.

The Petroleum Administration Act came into force in 1975, and was amended in 1978. That act contains four main parts. Part I provides for the petroleum export charges; Part II deals with domestic oil pricing; Part III deals with domestic gas pricing; Part III.1 provides for the charge on domestic petroleum and import petroleum and petroleum products; and Part IV deals with cost compensation—that is, petroleum import cost compensation and petroleum supplies transfer compensation.

The bill before us this evening would, first of all, change the name of "Petroleum Administration Act" to the more appropriate "Energy Administration Act," and formal authority is sought for several oil and gas pricing compensation initiatives. These would, in specific terms, establish a new oil export charge ceiling of $350 per cubic metre and provide authority to share one-half of the revenue from that charge with the producing provinces.

Secondly, this bill would establish the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge on marine and aviation fuel used by carriers in international transportation with a ceiling of $350 per cubic metre. That charge, I might add, was in effect for a definite period of time for aviation fuel—that is, from May 1981 to January 1982. It is still in effect as far as marine fuels are concerned. I will have more to say about that later. The authority for that provision arose out of a budget resolution presented in the October 1980 budget.

Honourable senators will recall that the charge, as announced in October 1980, was implemented by a ways and means motion in May 1981.

Thirdly, this bill would establish a new ceiling of $75 per cubic metre on the petroleum compensation charge to refiners and importers, and broaden the scope for payment for compensation to include expensive new domestic oil.

Fourthly, this bill would establish the Canadian ownership special charge and the Canadian ownership account.

Fifthly, this bill would establish authority for—and this is unusual in legislation—to terminate the special compensation charge which went into effect when the Government of Alberta imposed limits on the production of oil. It is not often that we receive legislation which establishes a charge put into effect by a budget resolution and, at the same time, terminates it. The charge was applied to all petroleum consumed in Canada to pay for the additional oil imports necessitated by the cutbacks in domestic oil production as initiated by the Alberta government. That began on March 2, 1981, and ended on September 21, 1981, as a result of the Canada-Alberta energy agreement.

I shall now deal with these proposed amendments. Honourable senators will recall that the oil export charges, which will be found in clauses 4 to 12 on pages 2 to 7 of the bill, were established in 1974 to ensure that when Canadian oil was exported the federal government received the difference between the domestic price of oil and the rapidly rising price which normally would have accrued to the exporter. The reason for the charge still holds true. There should be no price incentive, as I think will be obvious, to export our oil while Canada continues to be a net importer of oil.

● (2100)

The ceiling on the export charge in May 1979 was $50.50 per cubic metre. The charges have been increased since then by various ways and means motions. This bill would raise the ceiling on the export charge, but not the charge itself, to $350 per cubic metre effective May 1979.

Crude oil export charges would be shared in the following ways. The Government of Canada has indicated its intention to share with the producing provinces 50 per cent of the export charge revenue on crude oil exports found by the National Energy Board to be surplus to Canada's needs and that are subject to oil export charges. The National Energy Program proposed that that sharing would be effective November 1, 1980.

So far, the oil export charge has been applicable only to domestic crude-origin oil products. The government requires, however, companies which import foreign crude oil and receive import compensation for it to refund the full amount of this compensation for products which are derived from foreign crude oil and then exported. It is understood that if, in the future, an oil export charge is levied on oil products made from foreign crude oil, the exporter will not have to refund the import compensation.

The next item is the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge. For the life of me, I never understood how legislatures got some of the terminology applicable to some of these particular charges. That is an aside perhaps not germane to a debate on second reading, but it does arouse some philosophical speculation. In any event, that charge is dealt with in clause 12 at pages 7 to 10 of the bill. The transportation fuel compensation recovery charge will be placed on fuel used in international transportation by domestic or foreign aircraft and vessels. The purpose of the charge first announced in the October 1980 budget and implemented in a ways and means motion in May 1981 is to recover compensation paid in respect of oil imports. As a consequence of representations from foreign countries which claimed that the charge might contravene our bilateral air transport agreements, and in order to avoid the uncertainties pending a final and binding interpretation by an arbitration board of that matter, the government terminated the charge on aviation fuel as of January 31, 1982, and refunded the moneys paid indirectly by the foreign air carriers during those months. It did not refund the money paid by Canadian companies for fuel that they were using for flights into other countries. That point was somewhat controversial in the House of Commons.

In the future a "minimum just and reasonable price" will be maintained for aviation fuel exports to ensure that there is no leakage of subsidized domestic fuel oil prices for export into other countries. There no longer will be an incentive in foreign carriers to fuel up on subsidized Canadian fuel for use in other countries.

There are no bilateral agreements affecting fuel sold to foreign marine carriers as exist in respect of aviation. Therefore, that charge on marine fuel has been maintained. There is no provision for its discontinuance.

There were a great many questions about this charge in the House of Commons Standing Committee on Energy Legislation, and I do not think I need go into that. However, I ought to indicate to honourable senators who may be concerned that the Air Transport Association has requested to make a presentation to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I mention that in case honourable senators want to pursue it.

I should also make clear that that charge was not applied to other international modes of transport like the trucking and rail industries, because a modest amount is involved and the difficulties of administration are almost impossible in the latter cases.

The next particular charge I wish to deal with is the petroleum compensation charge and the compensation provisions of the bill. The ceiling on the petroleum compensation charge in July 1980 was $6.30 a cubic metre. However, the actual charges since then have been increased above the ceiling. This bill will raise the ceiling to $75 per cubic metre from July 1980. The actual charges under the petroleum compensation charge provisions will be set at levels that ensure that this charge is not a net revenue generator for the government. It is the fulfilment of a commitment made by the government in its energy agreement with Alberta last September. However, the new ceiling is high enough to allow the government flexibility to vary the charges to respond to changes in supply, demand and the international price of petroleum. The petroleum compensation charge ensures fairness among the various regions of Canada. As we know, the Atlantic provinces and certain parts of the province of Quebec depend upon high-cost imported oil to meet a large portion of their energy needs. The Government of Canada has taken steps to ensure that these regions will soon have access to domestic oil and gas production, but these efforts will take a few years to come to fruition.

Since 1974 it has been the policy of the government that no region in Canada should have to pay substantially higher oil costs because of the accident of geography which made them dependent upon imported oil. That is why the largest portion of the petroleum compensation charge, presently 65 per cent, is used to compensate refiners in these regions for the difference between the international oil price they must pay for imports and the price paid by refiners in the other parts of the country who have access to the less expensive Canadian production.

Another 23 per cent of the revenues raised by that charge is used to pay the international price for synthetic crude production from Syncrude and Suncor; about 10 per cent is used to provide the new oil reference price; and 2 per cent provides the special price for oil discovered after 1973 but before 1981, as outlined in the National Energy Program Update.

Since 1974 the government has paid $13.7 billion nationally to protect Canadians from sudden and dramatic rises in the world price. In Atlantic Canada, which is totally dependent on imports to meet its oil needs, consumers have been protected by $6.5 billion in compensation during this period.

The broadening of the petroleum compensation provisions in the bill will ensure that the enhanced price incentives for new oil exploration and development will be effective, thereby enhancing Canada's energy security and increasing industry activity in western Canada.

[Senator McIlraith.]

A major goal of the National Energy Program is to achieve oil self-sufficiency by 1990. The government is committed to trying to do this at prices that are fair and realistic both to the industry and to the general public.

The pricing and taxation regime set out in the National Energy Program and amended by energy agreements with the provinces, provincial royalty adjustments, and the National Energy Program Update, provide both large and small producers with the kind of return on investment they need to get on with the job of exploring and producing oil for Canada. Returns for the new oil reference price, for example, compare favourably with returns offered anywhere else in the world. This price applies to all companies developing oil discovered after 1980 anywhere in Canada.

At the same time, the government is providing a blended oil price that is less than prices prevailing elsewhere in the industrialized world. This regime provides the Canadian economy with the certainty and stability needed to plan economic development in the 1980s, no matter what happens to world oil prices.

I have with me this evening some figures showing the netbacks at the wellhead. Perhaps honourable senators would wish me to submit these figures to committee rather than refer to them in the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes, in committee.

Senator McIlraith: The net result of the prices offered to producers of different types of oil will be blended into one made-in-Canada price that will apply to all regions of the country, regardless of what kind of oil they use or whether it is domestic or imported.

I should point out that the Government of Canada does not set the price of gasoline to the consumer at the pumps. I think it is important to mention that. It establishes the price refiners pay for the crude they buy. This is the blended price, and it stood at about 70 per cent of the world price in January of this year.

After the refiners purchase the crude, several costs not under the government's control are added to the price. These costs are the cost of refining and transporting the oil to market; profit margins for refiners and retailers; and retail sales taxes. These retail sales taxes include a constant 9 per cent in federal sales and excise taxes. Provincial taxes then vary from zero to 40 per cent, depending on the province. It is zero, of course, in Alberta and about 13½ cents per litre in the province of Quebec. I should point out that 13½ cents per litre in Quebec is shockingly high when you bear in mind that the highest retail sales tax in any state of the United States is about 4½ cents. Undoubtedly, the provinces have very good reasons for levying these taxes.

It should be understood that I am trying to compare the prices of Canadian oil with foreign oil and the prices of gasoline at our pumps with foreign prices.

I should cite, for your reference, the special compensation charge which is dealt with in clause 40 of the bill. This provides the authority to terminate the special compensation charge.

The bill also provides for a Canadian ownership special charge and a Canadian ownership account. This seeks the formal authority for the Canadian ownership special charge which may finance acquisitions in the oil and gas industry by the Government of Canada. Revenues from this charge must be placed in a Canadian ownership account. Funds from this account are used to defray the cost of Petro-Canada's purchase of Petrofina more than a year ago.

In the future, this revenue could be used to finance additional purchases, including purchases on behalf of Petro-Canada or any other crown corporation created under the provision of Bill C-102.

In that regard, there is a rather interesting provision. The bill authorizes this to be done by order in council. However, this provision has a significant difference from most of our previous sections. Such order in council providing for the future use of the revenue can be dealt with by Parliament if, within so many days of the order in council's being tabled, steps are taken by the government to introduce a positive motion asking Parliament's concurrence or, if that is not done by government, a group of members bringing forward a negative motion asking that it be destroyed. The provisions in that regard are quite interesting. They arise out of some action taken by the Senate and a Senate committee dealing with Bill S-24 to enact the Canada-Germany Tax Agreement Act, 1982. A clause in that bill did not provide a safeguard; it permitted the Governor in Council to replace the existing agreement, amend it, or vary it in any way without anything further. Objection was taken to that in committee. In any event, similar provisions were put in this bill, when it was being prepared, after the omnibus energy bill was presented for first reading in the other place. I think honourable senators will agree that this satisfactorily deals with the problem that arose as a result of the granting of rather extensive power to the Governor in Council. That is a rather interesting sidelight, and a very important one, in my view.

● (2120)

I think, honourable senators, that it will be seen from my remarks that the bill is somewhat complicated, and, if you like, rather confusing to follow. If and when this bill receives second reading, and is referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, arrangements have been made to have the minister available for detailed questioning on these various charges, and for the attendance of various appropriate members of the departmental staff, who can give better and more precise information on this subject than I could ever hope to.

Honourable senators, I commend the bill to you for your favourable action.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Just so that the public and some of the senators can get a better appreciation of the figures you have mentioned, could you put on the record how many barrels there are in a cubic metre?

Senator McIlraith: Yes. A cubic metre would contain 6.29 barrels.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, after that feat of memory I feel somewhat intimidated in following my honourable friend in his discussion of this bill. I do so, however, because it is quite similar in principle and in impact on the people of Canada to Bill C-112, which I had the privilege of talking about last Tuesday.

This is a very complicated bill. It is an amending bill. If you cannot see it side by side with the legislation it amends it is something of a puzzle. I confess that for me, even after seeing it side by side with the bill it amends, it remains something of a puzzle. There are, however, certain themes or principles that can be discerned in the legislation before us.

First of all, this bill is a taxing measure. It provides for measures to deal with the innumerable different levels of taxation that are now being devised for the energy industry. We went over some of them in Bill C-112, and now in Bill C-103 we get more. The oil export charge is one, the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge is another, the price restraint provision is another, the petroleum compensation charge is another, and the Canadian ownership charge is another. We therefore have this wide variety of different forms of tax included in this bill, and I hope that at some stage we can hear how much money is involved. It seems to me that we can easily overlook the enormous quantities of money that are going to be drained out of the public pocket into the government purse when these taxes are proceeded with in the future.

There are just a couple of features of the bill I certainly find it hard to be enthusiastic about. First, I think I may say, in the case of almost every one of these different kinds of taxes I have referred to, that we find the Governor in Council deciding how much shall be taxed. I have always found that a difficult principle to agree with. The technicians may give us lots of good reasons why this is the way things have to be done; if so, it reinforces my opinion that the National Energy Program leaves something to be desired. When you consider, however, the enormous amounts of money that are to be raised—and I hazard the guess that my honourable friend who introduced the bill will tell us that it is in the billions of dollars—and when you know that they can be raised by order in council, you are certainly given food for thought. I would like to suggest to the Senate that this kind of principle in a taxing measure is one that is rather difficult to approve.

Secondly, this bill is filled with little special clauses by virtue of which the minister, in a particular instance where Parliament may have appropriated a certain sum, can spend more than that sum. Certain conditions and classifications of this kind of over-expenditure are laid out, but, there again, we have a completely open-ended situation with respect to the levying of taxes and the spending of money by the executive. That, too, I find to be a remarkable clause, and one that I cannot get very enthusiastic about.

Thirdly, there is an override provision in a number of sectors where no agreement on matters of mutual interest between the federal government and provincial governments is arrived at. It is very general, and does not lay down what is specifically at issue, but there are, I think, two or three clauses in terms of which, if no agreement is arrived at in an area where agreements are expected or anticipated, the federal government can go ahead and set a price or rate of tax by itself, anyway, unilaterally. There may be explanations as to why this should be the case, but, personally, I find it rather difficult to imagine why we should be enshrining this kind of executive power in legislation that the Senate is asked to pass.

We find many, many instances of executive action here, in the field of finance, completely at the discretion of the executive branch, with Parliament, in most cases, not even being informed in any formal way as to what has been done. There is a clause with respect to the purchase of other oil companies in Canada, like the purchase of Petrofina. As I read this bill, there is a clause that says that the minister, subject to the Governor in Council, can go ahead and spend any money he wishes in order to procure another oil business, as was done with Petrofina. He is completely able to do this in any amount, without restriction, on his own initiative, approved by his colleagues in the cabinet.

The Honourable Senator McIlraith was fair enough to point out that there is a provision in this bill for retroactive approval by Parliament. Fifteen days after the deal is consummated, or whatever the time is, the minister can produce a resolution requesting approval; or, if he does not do that, 20 members of this house and 40 members of the other house, or either one, can produce a negative resolution saying that it should not be done. I cannot understand why we do not adopt the simple, straightforward procedure of approving these things before they are done. Surely that is the time to do it. Can anyone imagine, in a House of Commons that operates by majority rule—and the government does have a majority—that the negative resolution will be anything more than a device to—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A rubber stamp!

Senator Roblin: A rubber stamp? Well, someone may say, "If they do it ahead of time, that is being a rubber stamp, too," and there is a great deal of weight in that argument; but it seems to me that it would be sensible for us to ask that this bill be amended to provide for approval before any transaction of the type visualized is carried out, rather than afterwards. I refer, of course, to situations in which approvals are required, and here is one case where the government, apparently, is willing to consider approvals.

In the practically unimaginable case where negative approval carried, and the deal was cancelled, can you imagine trying to unscramble that egg after it had been broken in the first instance? It is just an impractical proposition, and if there is going to be any kind of approval at all, it seems to me that it should be given in advance. That clearly is the sensible and reasonable way in which these things should be done.

[Senator Roblin.]

One is struck, on reading this bill, by the power of the executive to define terms. In all these transactions the man who controls the definitions is the man who runs the game. There is not any question in the world about that. In this act we have, time and time again, power given to the minister to define the issues in which he is involved.

● (2130)

With regard to the drafting of bills, perhaps I was educated in an old-fashioned arena. A dear old gentleman, Gerald Rutherford, Q.C.—I think he is about 100 years old now, and I am not exaggerating a bit—who was the legislative counsel for the Manitoba Legislature, taught me all I know about the drafting of bills. He always advised me to put the definitions in the bills, in that way leaving the minimum possible amount to order in council or to regulation, whereby the legislative authorities are bypassed and the power is conferred on the bureaucrats, the unelected government of the country. Of course, there are occasions, and I admit it frankly, when defining things in a bill is pretty difficult. But it seems to me that in this piece of legislation the government has gone out of its way not to define the issues of the bill, but to leave them to ministerial discretion, regulation and devices of that sort. I think this is another area of the bill that should be examined by the committee.

The bill provides for certain charges to be levied which can be appealed to the Tariff Board. I am sure that there is a reason for this, but it escapes me. If one does not like what the Tariff Board says, what does one do then? Presumably nothing, because no appeal procedure is provided for. All these items over which there is ministerial or bureaucratic discretion, particularly matters of definition, price, value and that sort of thing, as far as I can tell—and I stand to be corrected—are not subject to any review by anybody at all. In fact, the executive can do what they like. I do not like such provisions in a bill.

An effort was made to relate the tax structure to the price of gasoline. It is perfectly true that the government does not set the price of a gallon of gasoline. I am sorry, but I am not going to talk about litres at the present time; I am comfortable with gallons, and I am going to stick with gallons as long as I can. In any case, the government may not set the price but, by the Lord Harry, it is the biggest factor in price setting. The biggest chunk of the price of a gallon of gas goes to the federal government, not to the Province of Alberta, or to the province where the gas is sold, or to the industry. As I explained in this house on Tuesday, the share of the price of a gallon of gas going to the federal government was 18 cents when this government took office. It is 60 cents in this year of grace, including the taxes in this bill.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame!

Senator Roblin: The public may think it is a shame, but those on the other side do not seem to worry about it. Next year the government's share will be 77 cents.

Senator Asselin: The government lied to the people.

Senator Roblin: So that shows you what we have to look forward to.

This spring in Winnipeg one could buy a gallon of gas for $1.91. That is the made-in-Canada price that we all voted for in February 1980. This price was made in Canada to make sure that the OPEC countries did not rip us off. This is the government's protection to the gasoline consumer. As I also told the house the other day, if I trundle that little old car down to St. Paul, Minnesota, which is the nearest big American centre, the price of a gallon of gasoline is $1.83. I am speaking in terms of Canadian gallons and Canadian dollars. That is made-in-Canada prices and that is made-in-America prices. Only God knows where the price will go from here; I certainly do not; they change all the time. But it seems to me that we have an interesting gloss on the price of gas in this country and what has actually happened to it over the past eighteen months to two years.

Honourable senators, I will detain you no longer. The bill will go to committee and we will do our best to look into it there. But this entire exercise strikes me as an apt illustration of the undesirable and unnecessary problems in which we have involved ourselves with this gigantic effort to have administrative pricing and bureaucratic control over what was formerly a self-regulating industry. If the government wants the money, then I suggest that it tax the industry off the top and save all this trouble and mess that it gets into when it tries to tax it in this way. That is my recommendation to the Senate, and I hope that we will be able to get some support along the lines indicated by my honourable friend, Senator Asselin.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the sponsor, the same question as I put to Senator Godfrey with regard to Bill C-102. In comparing clause 65.273(2), on page 30, with clause 65.274(2), on page 31, in the first case the Senate should consider the motion on the fifth day at the latest and in the second case on the sixth day. Why is there that difference?

Senator Godfrey: If I may, I would like to answer the question. I asked the department the same question, and they did not give me a very satisfactory answer. However, they have since supplied me with a memorandum, and I shall read it, though I still do not think they are right. The memorandum reads:

The procedure contained in Bill C-102 for the establishment of a new crown corporation is intended to allow for the establishment of such corporations in a relatively rapid manner. It was thought that since a motion to have an order affirmed or revoked is to be filed first in the House of Commons, the Senate would be aware that a particular order is the object of scrutiny in the other place and would not, thus, be taken by surprise if a request for concurrence on the motion filed in the Commons or a motion to the effect that the order be revoked is filed. On the other hand, the house would not have such advance warning.

However, that overlooks the fact that in Bill C-102, in connection with affirmative resolutions it is the fifth sitting day and in connection with negative resolutions it is the sixth sitting day. I intend to phone the department tomorrow and point that out to them.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I have your indulgence to thank Senator Godfrey for sending me a note about the number of signatures required in the House of Commons for this negative resolution? He properly corrects me that it is 30 members. I think I said 40.

Senator McIlraith: And 15 in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: And 15 in the Senate. In any event, I appreciate the opportunity to make this correction. This bill was sprung on me a little quickly.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator Roblin, who made some excellent points in his speech. What gave me cause to wonder was his point that the ratification of a take-over bid should be made prior to the bid, not afterwards. It seems to me that such a proposition might create the situation where, if a public company were being taken over, the price might go up during the ratification process. To analogize it to a corporate situation, a take-over bid might be approved by the board of directors, but would probably not be the subject of a shareholders meeting prior to the making of the bid itself.

The honourable senator also stated that if the bid failed to be ratified after it had been made, it would create an impossible situation. Would he not agree that any bid that was made would be subject to ratification by Parliament?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I may answer the question, if the price established for Petrofina is any advertisement for following the secrecy system, then it fails to convince me that it is the proper way to go. In my humble opinion, one could hardly conceive of a more inflated price for Petrofina than that which was actually agreed upon in secret negotiations between the parties concerned. So, while it is perfectly true that negotiations are confidential, if the government is going to subject the matter to any form of approval at all, that certainly ought to be done before its signature is finally placed on the deal, rather than after. Apart from that, I think it is perfectly true that any arrangement made in advance with the board of directors would have to be contingent on subsequent approval. But I do not see that you are any worse off having that contingent vote related to prior approval by Parliament than you are with regard to retroactive approval by Parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

GARNISHMENT, ATTACHMENT AND PENSION DIVERSION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-38, to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments.

He said: Honourable senators, the short title of Bill C-38 is the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act, and it will be appreciated from its number that it has been around for some time. As a matter of fact, it is even older than the number would indicate, because in principle, I believe, it preceded the Clark government, and was to have been presented by our distinguished colleague, Senator Flynn, as a part of that government's legislative program. Senator Flynn may know more about garnishment, attachment and pension diversion than I, but I will give what I consider to be the highlights of the bill, following which I hope we will have an intervention on the same subject from him.

I shall first deal with garnishment, since that is the key to the bill. Garnishment is a statutory proceeding whereby a person's property, money or credits in possession or under control of, or owing by, another are applied to payment of that person's debt to a third person. More simply put, and by way of example, if one is owed money, particularly after a judgment, one way to collect it is to try to divert, seize or garnish it from the salary of the debtor. Garnishment is almost always used for that purpose.

What is the reason for this bill? What is the wrong to be righted by it? It is this, honourable senators: While it is difficult to believe—although lawyers will believe it—at the present time, the statutory process by which monies are seized to satisfy a judgment given by a court cannot be used against those of us who receive our salaries from the Crown's purse.

Honourable senators might wonder why that is so. I would remind them of what Sir Walter Scott, in his short story entitled "Imprisonment for Debt," called "the elegance of the legal fiction." The elegance of this legal fiction is that monies owed by a servant of the Crown cannot be garnisheed because the royal prerogative prevents court orders from binding the Crown. Bill C-38, in creating the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act, would remove the royal prerogative from the garnishment process, thereby permitting the garnishment of the salaries of federal public servants. This bill would permit income received from the federal Crown to be garnisheed to satisfy family support orders and other debts of a commercial nature. Once this bill is passed, public servants will be in the same position as their neighbours. They will no longer be able to hide behind the royal prerogative to avoid honouring their debts.

The plan of this bill, is to use the provincial garnishment laws to determine how much of the salary of a public servant living in a particular province can be garnisheed. Honourable senators will understand that it would not be reasonable to permit someone's entire salary to be garnisheed. There are various limits provided in provincial law. Other procedural rules will apply unless they result in heavy expense or in an expanded work force to handle additional administration.

Those of us who have been involved in the garnishment process as a creditor or an employer will appreciate the improved and simplified procedures, which should result in savings to the debtor by reducing court costs. I will explain some of these procedures, after which I will ask honourable Senators' commendation and support for the bill.

The procedures outlined in this bill that will result in the simplified process include, first, a notice of intention to garnishee. This notice must be given to locate the proper employee from a large, decentralized public service—in other words, to ensure that the creditor gets the right John Doe.

Secondly, regardless of the time at which the garnishee process is served, it will apply to the next closest pay period. This sounds rather esoteric and arcane, but honourable senators would not believe how arcane the garnishment law has been up to this point. It was always imperative that the garnishment order be served on the exact day the debtor was paid, because if it was served one day too late, the creditor would receive nothing for his efforts because nothing was considered to be owed. Therefore, this should simplify the process a great deal.

Thirdly, the bill provides that there is no need to calculate what is "due or accruing due". The calculation is made on the basis of a pay period—for example, two weeks.

Fourthly, there is no need for personal service, and registered mail can be used.

Some of the other features of the bill and regulations also clarify which crown corporations will fall under this act—and that will depend on whether the crown corporation or department concerned receives its moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund—and those which will follow in total provincial law.

At the present time, there is a special provision that applies to the Canadian armed forces with reference to family financial support orders. The Canadian armed forces have compulsory pay allotments of up to 10 days' pay and allowances per month to satisfy family financial support orders. The new rules under these regulations will follow the principles under the new act in their application to the armed forces.

Honourable senators will notice that the second part of the bill deals with pension diversion, about which I will say a few words, since it is a major part of the bill. It is covered by sections 21 to 37.

Presently under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the responsible minister has the discretion to divert pension benefits in order to pay a valid support order. That discretion has always been exercised to pay support up to 50 per cent of the pension benefit. This bill removes the ministerial discretion, and makes it mandatory, for a family support order, to pay the amount permitted by provincial law and, where there is no provincial law, to pay up to 50 per cent of the pension benefit.

Honourable senators, the entire bill signifies a great improvement in the area of family support orders. Statistics indicate, although it is very difficult to believe, that 70 per cent of all family support orders, after five years, are in default. By streamlining the process, as this bill does, I think that that situation can be vastly improved.

I should emphasize that Part II of the bill applies only to employee-employer financed benefit plans, and applies only when benefits become payable. Those pensions which are not included in the bill are the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security pensions and the veterans' pensions. These are not subject to diversion provisions contained in this act.

Honourable senators, the bill has the support of provincial governments, women's groups, public service unions and creditors' organizations, and I hope that, with this background, you will be able to find your way through the bill more easily.

● (2150)

The operative clause that sets up the entire principle, is clause 3. That is the one that removes this exemption from garnishment of Her Majesty and Her Majesty's servants, particularly Her Majesty's servants. Division I deals with crown corporations whose funds come from the consolidated revenue fund. That takes in clauses 4 through 13. Division II deals with crown corporations whose funds do not come from the consolidated revenue fund. Division III deals with Canadian forces, and Division IV deals with general provisions.

Part II deals with diversion of pension benefits to satisfy financial support orders. There are also some general provisions and the usual consequential amendments. In this case there are a number of consequential amendments because there are so many separate statutes under which public servants receive their income.

Honourable senators, the principle established in this bill is long overdue and I believe it sets out, in an organized way, the implementation of that principle, namely, the garnishment of pay due to servants of Her Majesty the Queen.

I would ask honourable senators to support the bill on second reading. In view of the principle of the bill and the length of time it has taken to get it before Parliament, I suggest that it does not require study by committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I may have a few comments to make on this bill, but due to the lateness of the hour I shall move the adjournment of the debate. In any event, I may tell the Deputy Leader of the Government that I agree that the bill need not be referred to committee.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

BIRTH OF A SON TO THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

RESOLVED,—That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY:
MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our congratulations to Your Majesty on the birth of a Prince, a son to Their Royal Highnesses, The Prince and Princess of Wales, and assuring Your Majesty that this happy event affords the greatest joy and satisfaction to Your faithful Members of the House of Commons of Canada.

ORDERED,—That a Message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has passed an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, expressing congratulations on the occasion of the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address.

Attest

C. B. KOESTER

The Clerk of the House of Commons

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h), I am pleased to move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the Senate do agree with the House of Commons in the said Address by filling up the blank spaces left therein with the words "Senate and".

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that house that the Senate do agree to the Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen offering congratulations on the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and have inserted in the blank spaces therein the words "Senate and".

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the following Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please your Excellency:

The Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing congratulations on the occasion of the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and respectfully request that your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate have passed the said Address and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the said Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting therein the words "and Commons".

Motion agreed to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.;

That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said Address to His Excellency the Governor General on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit the Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing congratulations on the occasion of the birth of a Prince, son of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting therein the words "and Commons".

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATION TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggressions must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the role of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I was absent when this matter came before the house last Thursday, and I understand the order stood. There is no reason why we should not proceed with this order.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that the honourable senator does not want to add anything to the motion; that he does not wish to speak to it. Senator Asselin moved the adjournment because he wanted to make some comments. If Senator Croll wishes to speak to it, then he may do so.

Senator Croll: No, I do not want to speak to it. The motion speaks for itself.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON THE ESTIMATES LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1983

June 21, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, were referred has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, February 23, 1982, examined the said estimates, and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of February 23, 1982, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983."

OVERVIEW

Introducing the main estimates for the year 1982-83, the Honourable Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board informed the Committee of the levels of anticipated spending. The forecast requirement for $16.8 billion for public debt represented 23 per cent of the total budget of $72.9 billion. Almost one-half of the total increase in anticipated expenditure—$4.4 billion—was caused by higher interest rates and growth in the debt itself. Transfer payments account for another 31 per cent of the growth in expenditure, especially for old age security and family allowances. Of the remaining $2.6 billion increase, which was attributable to departmental and agency operating and capital costs, the Department of National Defence is to receive $1.1 billion more funds than last year. Increases in person-years in the public service have been kept to 0.8 per cent.

INTEREST RATES AND THE RATES OF EXCHANGE

In the course of its review of the departmental estimates for the year 1982-83, the Committee decided to explore a number of issues regarding the relationship between the value of the Canadian dollar and interest rates in Canada.

Over the past year, Canadian interest rates have followed a volatile course at historically high levels. These interest rates and their movements have been claimed to be the major source of the current economic recession and more stable and moderate rates are said to be the necessary ingredient for economic recovery in the future. Such concerns over Canadian interest rates have led to considerable controversy in Canada. Some have argued that such rates are the result of the Bank of Canada's slavish following of U.S. interest rate movements in efforts to protect the exchange value of the Canadian dollar; while others believe that the rate movements are reflections of financial market pressures originating within Canada. Resolution of such divergent views and the selection of an appropriate policy in the future are obviously very important and contentious matters given the current depressed economic environment.

The major issues discussed with the witnesses by the Committee included the following:

1) What is the cause of high and volatile interest rates in Canada and are they primarily a reflection of domestic economic and financial conditions or are they being imposed mainly by external forces emanating from the United States?

2) Are high interest rates appropriate for the Canadian economy under current conditions of simultaneous recession and inflation and has there been a satisfactory trade-off between the costs of recession and the anti-inflation benefits under this policy approach?

3) What would be the impact of a lower Canadian dollar exchange rate on inflation and growth in Canada and would the improved competitive position arising from a devaluation of the currency offset the inflationary impact of a lower Canadian dollar?

4) How much lower would the Canadian dollar fall if interest rates in Canada were lowered significantly below U.S. levels and how would the exchange rate be maintained at the lower level?

5) What other factors have influenced the level of the Canadian dollar exchange rate in the recent past and should action be taken to strengthen these influences on the currency in order to offset the impact on the currency of lower Canadian interest rates?

6) Are there other policy initiatives that could be taken to reduce the inflationary impact of a lower Canadian dollar and would price and income controls be an alternative policy approach?

The witnesses called before the Committee to explore these issues and give their views on the future course of interest rate and exchange rate policies in Canada were:

| Issue no. | Date | Witness |
|--------------|----------------|--|
| 44 | March 23, 1982 | Mr. Gerald K. Bouey, Governor, Bank of Canada |
| 46 | March 25, 1982 | The Honourable Walter Gordon, P.C., Chairman, Canadian Institute for Economic Policy |
| 47 | March 30, 1982 | Mr. James W. Burns, President, Power Corporation of Canada |
| 52 | May 4, 1982 | Dr. Robert MacIntosh, President, Canadian Bankers Association |
| 53 | May 6, 1982 | Dr. Thomas Courchene, Department of Economics, University of Western Ontario |

These witnesses were chosen by the Committee to provide a cross-section of views from the federal government, financial institutions, business corporations, and the academic community.

Evidence given by witnesses before the Committee indicated that the high interest rates experienced in Canada over the past year have been the result of a number of factors with no single one being the prime cause of high and volatile interest rates. It was emphasized by Mr. Bouey that given the current inflation rate in Canada, interest rates have been in the range that one would expect. However, much of the volatility of Canadian interest rates around this trend to higher levels was due to the volatility in U.S. interest rates during this period. He stated that it was an unavoidable fact that shifts in financial conditions in the United States affect the Canadian situation, causing reactions in interest rates or the exchange rate, or both. However, he pointed out that developments within Canada could also have substantial impacts on both interest rates and the exchange rate. He cited the impact on the exchange rate of the high levels of Canadian take-overs of foreign controlled businesses during the middle part of 1981. This was followed by a steep upward interest rate movement as the Bank moved to reduce the extraordinary downward pressures on the Canadian dollar which resulted from the movement of capital from Canada. He maintained, however, that the reactions of the Bank were not motivated by a fixation on any particular exchange rate but rather by a desire to avoid aggravating an already highly inflationary situation.

Since the Canadian inflation rate is now significantly higher than in the United States, the Governor stated that it would be extraordinary to expect that Canadian interest rates could be reduced significantly without generating a sharp decline in the exchange rate. He concluded by saying that the goal of the Bank of Canada is to lower the rate of inflation in Canada and that monetary policy has responded to the developments that have posed a threat to that objective, whether the developments originated in Canada or abroad. Dr. MacIntosh and Dr. Courchene observed that care has to be taken in drawing conclusions from the consumer price index figures announced each month in the two countries, and the two indices are constructed quite differently. For example, had the Canadian index for January and February been constructed using U.S. practices, the rate of inflation reported in Canada would have been 7 or 8 per cent, considerably below the officially reported rate of over 11 per cent. Dr. Courchene commented on the reasons for this difference as follows:

There are two differences—two important differences—between the way we calculate our CPI and the way Americans do. The first difference is that the typical figure which appears in the U.S. is a month-to-month inflation rate, January to February, taken to the twelfth power, or cumulated for the whole year . . . In Canada, we normally tend to express our rate of inflation from January to January—for one year. So, if things are moving downward in the U.S. in terms of inflation, that gets captured much more quickly in their inflation rate than it would in ours.

The second difference that is equally important is that the Americans tend to assume that everyone has mortgaged his house at the current interest rate, whereas we use a five-year average. So, if interest rates go up from 14 per cent to 18 per cent in the U.S., that 18 per cent is viewed as the rate at which everyone is mortgaging his house. When you recognize that, and recognize what I said in the first point, a rise in interest rates in the U.S. can give a steep increase in the inflation rate simply because everyone's current mortgage interest rate is used as the housing component and that gets multiplied by 12.

In Canada, we have a five-year moving average. So, if interest rates go from 14 per cent to 18 per cent, we take that 18 per cent figure in this year and drop the figure from five years ago, and we have the average. So, interest rates have a much smaller influence on our housing component.

I suppose the correct answer is somewhere in between, because the mortgage term is closer to two years now than it is to five years.

So, because of this, one can see tremendous volatility in U.S. inflation rates. For example, in early 1980, the American inflation rate was 18 per cent, but by August, it was zero—in fact, it was negative, and that reflected a very severe decline in interest rates in the U.S. of 10 percentage points in six or eight weeks. This decline in the U.S. inflation rate was due primarily to the fall in interest rates and the way they entered the CPI via the housing component.

There are disadvantages and advantages to this procedure. The only point which the Governor has made on several occasions—and that I think that we ought to be very aware of as well—is that quite often our inflation rates are compared one to the other, and we should be careful that we are comparing oranges and oranges and not oranges and apples.

In his testimony, the Honourable Walter Gordon took exception to the Bank of Canada policy. He expressed the opinion that the anti-inflation policies of high interest rates, tough restrictions on the growth of the money supply, and preoccupation with maintaining the exchange rate had been a dismal failure and that costs of these policies have been much too high in terms of slow growth and high unemployment. As an alternative to these policies, he suggested that the monetary policy pursued by the Bank of Canada since 1975 should be discontinued immediately and the Bank rate should be reduced by 3 or 4 percentage points and should not be allowed to follow any further uptrend in U.S. interest rates. This would result in a decline in the Canadian dollar exchange rate which, in his view, would be less harmful than the present high rates of interest. He pointed out, however, that he does not advocate an uncontrolled increase in the money supply; the money supply should only be raised only moderately from time to time to accommodate the expansion of Canadian business. Under these proposals, he did not foresee the dollar dropping sharply but if it did encounter serious speculative pressures it should be defended by the use of stand-by credit arrangements and not by raising Canadian interest rates. He also suggested that a limited program of price and wage controls should be implemented to control inflation in the Canadian economy as a replacement to the current monetary and exchange rate policies.

Mr. Burns argued strongly in his testimony, that inflation is by far the most important problem confronting Canada and the western world at the present time and that it would be foolhardy not to address the issue of inflation and inflationary expectations. He also felt that as long as the inflation rate was in the 10-12 per cent range we could not expect anything but high interest rates, and he would not support any measures that would artificially lower interest rates in the context of continuing high inflation. Any sharp drop in the Canadian dollar exchange rate below the 80 cents U.S. level could, he thought, be a trap for Canadian exporters because of the higher wage rates currently being paid in Canada compared to those in the United States. Under these circumstances, if the Canadian dollar recovered again, the Canadian export industry would be priced out of markets because their exchange rate benefit would have disappeared and they would by then be paying even higher wage rates. In addition, he claimed that any sharp decline in the exchange rate would be inflationary and tend to raise wage demands further. Mr. Burns also expressed serious concern about the relative wage rates in Canada and the U.S., which had moved against Canada, and the different attitudes and philosophies that now existed in the two countries regarding wage settlements. Expressing the opinion "that time is not on our side", he thought that reality would eventually catch up with Canada.

Mr. Burns drew attention to the financial problems facing major corporations, which was not limited to high interest rates. More serious, he suggested, was the unavailability of longer-term fixed rate funds that corporations required for long-term investment decisions. "If you are a business person and you have to borrow money to survive, there is no long term . . . you are whipped on two sides. You are hit on your cash flow operations, on the one hand, and your only available financing is at a floating rate. It is a very dangerous time" to invest and long-term planning is impossible.

In commenting on the proposal to lower Canadian interest rates arbitrarily by 3 to 4 percentage points below U.S. rates, Dr. MacIntosh pointed out that large amounts of capital would flow out of Canada instantaneously under these circumstances causing a corresponding instant reaction of the Canadian dollar exchange rate. He went on to state that this would require the use of exchange controls to stop this type of outflow and he felt that the cost and complexity of such controls would not be tolerated by Canadians. As a result, he concluded that any efforts to arbitrarily lower Canadian interest rates below U.S. levels would simply not work. He did point out, however, that Canada's personal savings rate has been substantially higher than that in the U.S. and that this should mean that Canada could have a lower level of interest rates. This has not happened, he claimed, because these savings have been drained off to finance the very large federal deficit and the corporate take-overs associated with the Canadianization measures in the National Energy Program. Dr. MacIntosh's major criticism of the monetary policy being followed by the Bank of Canada is their use of the M1 definition of money supply as the main indicator of money supply growth. He felt that a much broader definition that would include all highly liquid deposits held at the chartered banks, trust companies, and credit unions should be used to guide monetary policy.

Dr. Courchene's major criticisms of the Bank of Canada's policy were: that the Bank implemented the policy too gradually; that it should not have made the exchange rate a goal of its policy; that the use of M1 as its definition of money supply hampered its performance; and that the use of interest rates as a control mechanism reduces the effectiveness of its policy. He also pointed out that other federal policies, especially energy and fiscal policies have failed to provide support to the Bank in its anti-inflation fight. In his view the appropriate aggregate to use was "the current M1 plus a range of assets or liabilities . . . used for chequable deposits and for short-term repositories for funds used for that purpose".

Professor Courchene recommended that the authorities continue with the policy of monetary gradualism after taking account of their errors in implementing the policy in the past, and he strongly opposed the imposition of wage and price controls as part of a policy package that called for a considerable easing of monetary policy. This, he felt, would only postpone and exacerbate the problem of dealing with inflation and would hinder the response of Canadian industry to the new international challenges that it now faces. This is particularly so given the evidence that the private sector wages and prices are on the verge of quite a dramatic decline similar to that which is taking place in the United States. By establishing the exchange rate as a goal of monetary policy, the U.S. discipline on wages and prices is now being imported into Canada and Dr. Courchene felt that this could be part of the Bank of Canada's strategy.

The majority of testimony received by the Committee supported the view that the major cause of high interest rates in Canada has been the high rate of inflation in the Canadian economy coupled with the policy of monetary gradualism followed by the Bank of Canada. The volatility of interest rates, however, has been accentuated by the behaviour of U.S. interest rates and some concern was expressed about the Bank of Canada's response to these U.S. developments. In particular it was felt by most witnesses that the Bank could have avoided following these short term fluctuations in U.S. rates, as they did on some occasions and let the Canadian dollar decline somewhat for temporary periods. Generally, the majority of witnesses agreed with the Bank's policy of gradual monetary restraints but a view was expressed that the Bank should have been more aggressive and consistent in following their policy of monetary gradualism. In addition, the M1 definition of money supply used by the Bank in their policy formulation process was questioned by a number of witnesses who felt that a broader definition would be more appropriate and effective in conducting monetary policy. An opposite view was expressed to this consensus view by the Honourable Walter Gordon, but even he recommended only a cautious move towards greater monetary expansion.

Most witnesses also expressed concern about attempts to lower Canadian interest rates below U.S. rates and the effect this would have on the Canadian dollar exchange rate. Dr. MacIntosh described in considerable detail the volume of liquid funds which could be moved almost instantaneously to the United States. "If interest rates were to be moved down several percent . . . (we would be hit) so fast that the exchange reserves in the Bank of Canada . . . would go between Tuesday and Thursday." Most felt that the Bank could have been more flexible in its attitude towards the level of the Canadian dollar from time to time but opposed any significant decline in the exchange rate because of the likely impact on inflation in Canada. In fact, one view was that only foreign exchange control would now be effective in stopping the decline of the Canadian dollar, although other witnesses argued strongly against the feasibility or desirability of exchange controls. On this point Dr. MacIntosh stated:

For 1981, there were 147 million border crossings. If we talk about foreign exchange controls, first of all we are talking about having a bureaucratic system which would examine the pockets of everybody going over the border, because that is just what we would have to do. Border crossings are only part of it. If you go to Buffalo, Miami, or Seattle, or wherever you can use a credit card. The Visa card systems are worldwide now and we have a settlement system with the Visa card. If you had exchange controls, you would have everyone checking out his Visa card, to get his limit, and also the Master card, Diners Club, the Texaco credit card, and so on. If you talk about solving the problem of unemployment in this country, if you had a foreign exchange control board I daresay we would absorb the one million unemployed people in Canada. We would solve the unemployment problem. That is to say nothing of capital markets—I have not mentioned them—or ordinary business transactions, the flow of transactions, and exports and imports. The stock market, the bond market, the money market, the commodities market: you would have to go into every single one of them.

Sometimes people say without thinking "Well, let us not do all that. Let us just do transactions over $1 million. Let us just do the capital markets"; but there is no such thing. Money is—the word is frangible: you can divide it infinitely. You can change its form; you can buy stocks and sell them. If you could not get a Visa card or Master card transaction, you could buy American Telephone stock today in New York, and sell it tomorrow, and you would have U.S. dollars. So you cannot separate the capital market from the current market; and you would never succeed in separating the big market from the small market. You would still have flows which would adjust to that. It would be impossible. If you go in for exchange control, you go the whole way.

One of the major reasons cited for the weakness of the Canadian currency was the lack of confidence in other Canadian policies, especially fiscal and energy policies. In particular, the National Energy Program's Canadianization measure which resulted in a series of corporate takeovers of foreign-owned companies, was claimed both to have weakened the Canadian dollar and increased the demand for credit in Canada, which in turn had the effect of putting upward pressure on Canadian interest rates.

Considerable concern was expressed by a number of witnesses regarding the competitive position of Canadian industry in the world economy and the threat posed by the recent and current high wage settlement experienced in Canada, particularly in the public sector. This concern has been increased further by the perceived rapid decline in inflation and wage settlements in the United States during the current recession, and the absence of such a reaction in Canada. Most witnesses felt that current monetary policy in Canada would eventually reduce wage settlements in the private sector, although they expected this impact would be much less in the sheltered public sector. As a result, even though the majority of witnesses opposed the imposition of general price and wage controls in Canada, they expressed a desire for greater restraint in the case of public sector wage settlements. Dr.

Courchene stated that "I have long argued that if the federal government wants to lend manufactured support to the Bank of Canada, it should set wage guide lines for its own employees, guide lines which would be consistent with the inflation projection of the ongoing monitoring policy."

The majority were of the view that the federal government should have used fiscal policy more aggressively in support of the restrictive monetary policy and that a smaller fiscal deficit would be helpful in reducing interest rates and inflation in Canada. Again the Honourable Walter Gordon argued the opposite case and suggested fiscal policy should now become more stimulative as part of an economic recovery package that would also include wage and price controls.

The major areas of concern expressed during the testimony related to the demand for credit and the definition and measurement of money supply. The annual rate of growth of over 40 percent in short-term credit during the second and third quarter of 1981 was a matter of particular worry. The take-over of corporations during that period had distorted the expected rate of growth of credit based on prevailing economic conditions. Mr. Bouey suggested that this distortion had made the conduct of monetary policy more difficult during that period. Several witnesses also argued that some important policy decisions taken by the government, such as the National Energy Program, had had a major impact on the financial system.

Considerable discussion took place regarding the M1 measure of money supply. Mr. Bouey expressed serious reservations about the measure in the light of the greater flexibility now offered to depositors by the banking system, as a result of which a wide range of deposit accounts had become available. The Bank of Canada had attempted to adjust for these movements between various types of accounts, but they had found this step to be difficult and unreliable, and they had been obliged to make major revisions to their money supply numbers from time to time. Several other witnesses expressed serious doubts about the appropriateness of the M1 measure of monetary supply and generally favoured a broader definition, although there was no consensus on a precise alternative. It was emphasized by some witnesses that the monetary gradualism approach followed by the Bank of Canada was very dependent on having an accurate and reliable measure of money supply, which was a major variable taken into account in determining policy changes.

LOAN GUARANTEES AND LETTERS OF COMFORT

During an earlier hearing to review Supplementary Estimates (E) for 1981-82, the Committee asked the Treasury Board for information relating to the appointment and responsibility of directors of firms which are Crown corporations or heavily supported by the Crown, and information regarding loan guarantees and the use of letters of comfort.

A hearing was arranged on June 15 to receive the Treasury Board's report and to question the President of the Treasury Board, The Honourable Donald J. Johnston. He was accompanied by Mr. J. L. Mannion, Secretary of the Board, Mr. H. J. Mullington, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch and other senior officials. At that time the President of the Treasury Board provided the Committee with material respecting the government's spending as outlined in the main estimates for the year ending March 31, 1983.

The Committee was informed that directors of Crown corporations are appointed by the Governor in Council. However, for corporations in which the government does not have an equity interest but which have significant federal support, there is a monitoring process to protect the governments financial interest. The responsibility for monitoring lies with the Minister to whom the corporation reports and involves approval on an annual basis by the Governor in Council of operating and capital budgets and, in some cases, corporate plans. Annual, quarterly and in some instances monthly financial reports are also received by the government. A few corporations also have provisions for annual reports to Parliament and can be called before parliamentary committees. However, this does not apply to Canadair Ltd. or de Havilland.

Most directors of Crown corporations are drawn from the private sector but are appointed by the government. In the case of Canadair Ltd. and de Havilland, one official of the department to which the corporations report is a director of both corporations. Not all corporations with government guarantees have government directors. The Committee was informed that in the case where the government does not hold an equity interest, a government director could face a conflict of interest between public policy goals and the maximization of profit. The Committee was also told that in cases where directors are appointed by the government, they receive instructions from the responsible Minister to whom they report. A more general set of instructions and terms of reference for government directors is currently being studied by the government.

Canadair Ltd. and de Havilland are not scheduled Crown corporations because the government intended to dispose of these corporations to private investors and did not wish to take a step which would be in conflict with this objective. This decision might now have to be reconsidered.

The Committee enquired about the issuance of letters of comfort to support borrowing by Crown corporations or corporations largely or wholly owned by the Crown. This has been a relatively common practice in recent years and the only requirement is approval by the Governor in Council. There is no time limit, the Committee was informed, before these letters must be replaced by formal government guarantees and the Minister admitted that the time lapse has appeared to be unusually long in some cases, particularly in the case of Canadair Ltd. Treasury Board agreed to provide the committee with a list of comfort letters currently outstanding and a further list showing the time lapse between the issuance of letters of comfort and the approval of guarantees during the past five years.

The Minister acknowledged several criticisms: that these letters of comfort did not appear as contingent liabilities in the accounts of the government, have not been made public and provide inadequate control once issued. While he supported the controlled use of letters of comfort in circumstances of urgency in which there was insufficient time for a guarantee bill in supplementary estimates, the Minister asserted that they should be replaced quickly by formal and public guarantees. He expressed the opinion that the practice appears to have grown too quickly and without adequate attention by Parliament. Members of the Committee felt that they constituted contingent liabilities and should be supported in supplementary estimates. The Minister appeared to agree with this opinion.

The Committee also raised the matter of a secret report on Consolidated Computer Incorporated (CCI) that had been leaked to the press, but never officially released by the government. The Minister informed the Committee that this report was currently being studied by the Department of Justice which had just hired outside counsel in order to determine whether charges should be laid against individuals involved in the company. As a result, a decision had been made by the government not to release the report to the public. The Minister stated that the priorities in dealing with this report were to hold individuals responsible for their actions and to ensure a mechanism is in place to prevent future events of this type.

The Committee was informed by the Minister that in the very near future legislation will be tabled that will increase the monitoring and policing devices at the disposal of the government.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1982-83

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-121, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Leave is being asked, Your Honour, but I think some explanation should be given because we have voted interim supply until the end of this month. Whether we pass the bill today, tomorrow or on June 30, the government will be able to manage.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn is quite right. Interim supply has been voted. I cannot say that it has run out or that the government will be starved for funds if we do not pass this bill today. However, since the bill was passed by the other place early this morning, and since Senator Everett will be speaking to the report of the National Finance Committee on the main estimates, which constitute the subject of this bill, it seems to me that this afternoon is an appropriate time to deal at least with the second reading stage. In essence, the bill is simply the statutory version of the estimates. After second reading we can decide when to give it third reading and have Royal Assent today or tomorrow. The reason for asking that the bill be put on the Order Paper for second reading today is that that will allow an opportunity to deal with it immediately after we consider the report of the National Finance Committee on the main estimates.

Senator Flynn: The deputy leader has mentioned that we could dispose of the second reading stage today. There is therefore no demand by the government to have the bill today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it was my hope that we could have third reading today, but I am certainly not insisting on it. The reason for asking that second reading of the bill be proceeded with today is, as I have explained, that the committee's report on the main estimates will be considered this afternoon. While honourable senators have their attention on the estimates, it seemed to me an appropriate time to proceed with second reading. We will then be in a position to discuss whether something in the bill, as distinct from the estimates, or even something in the estimates, requires further study.

If honourable senators are not satisfied with the report of the committee on the estimates, or if there is some feature of the bill that needs further study, the debate can be adjourned. It seems to me that we would be in a much better position to deal with it if we proceed to second reading today, and then the whole matter would be before the Senate.

The opposition may not wish to give this bill second reading today. However, I suggest that it is appropriate to introduce the bill on second reading this afternoon, and if leave is granted we can then go on to establish whether there is a good reason for not having Royal Assent this week after hearing the debate on the consideration of the committee's report and the introductory speech on second reading.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am quite sure that the deputy leader realizes that a debate on a bill such as this could cover a very large territory. We could review the whole policy of the government relating to matters of expenditure, restraint, and so on.

If the idea is that the sponsor of the bill should move second reading today and that the debate would be adjourned until tomorrow, with third reading taking place next week, that puts a different perspective on the matter. If that is the intention of the Deputy Leader of the Government, the opposition will allow the sponsor to move second reading of the bill, and we will adjourn the debate until tomorrow, and perhaps third reading could be given next week.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the summation of the Leader of the Opposition does not quite take my point. I am not asking for an undertaking from anyone that the bill get third reading either today or tomorrow. All I am asking is that that option remain open.

Obviously, without unanimous consent, the debate can be adjourned until tomorrow and, unless a further adjournment is refused, which is highly unlikely, the matter could go on until next week.

I am asking the Senate to permit me to introduce the bill today, and then we can try to ascertain when we can complete the debate and proceed to third reading. I do not want to give an undertaking that the bill will not receive third reading this week because it may turn out that it will.

Senator Flynn: I misunderstood the Deputy Leader of the Government. I thought he wanted the bill to receive Royal Assent today, and that the government would be happy to have the bill read the third time today.

Senator Frith: It would.

Senator Flynn: If that is not the intention or the desire of the government, then we will take our time and the bill will be assented to next week.

On the other hand, if the government would be happy to have third reading today, we on this side might agree on the condition, for instance, that the Leader of the Government or the genial Minister of State for Economic Development undertake to participate in the debate on the motion of Senator Phillips before, let me say, Wednesday of next week. This would give us some idea of the direction the government is taking. If we had that undertaking, we would agree to third reading of the bill today. We would have a substitute for a full debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as to the happiness or otherwise of the government concerning third reading of this supply bill, we would be very happy if the bill were to receive third reading today; and quite happy if it were to receive third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Martial Asselin: And unhappy for it to receive third reading next week.

Senator Frith: I suppose the happiness would be gradually reduced from there on.

I should like to give any undertaking necessary to get third reading today, but the undertaking was not asked of me and, therefore, I yield to my colleague.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hereby give the requested commitment to the Leader of the Opposition. I would be most pleased to make a statement with respect to economic policy by Wednesday of next week.

Senator Asselin: A speech—a real speech.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator promises to be in the chamber, it will be a real speech.

Senator Asselin: I will be here.

Senator Perrault: If we can have the assurance that this bill will be dealt with expeditiously, as discussed, I would be more than pleased to comply with the request to speak by Wednesday on the resolution moved by Senator Phillips.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: It proves that politics, like life, is an exchange.

[Senator Frith.]

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

"INDUSTRY IN TURMOIL"—COMMITTEE REPORT ON THE LONG TERM STABILIZATION OF THE BEEF INDUSTRY IN CANADA TABLED

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow tabled:

Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on the long term stabilization of the beef industry in Canada, entitled "Industry in Turmoil."

He said: If I may, honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments on the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sparrow: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sparrow: First of all, honourable senators, I appreciate your giving me leave to speak on this report today. I shall be as concise as I can in giving you some information on it.

I am pleased, honourable senators, to present the report "Industry in Turmoil," because I believe it fairly represents what we think is the consensus reached by beef producers in Canada at this time. This study is dedicated to the Honourable Senator Harry Hays, and, if I may, I would like to quote the In Memoriam as it appears in the report:

This study is dedicated to the Hon. Senator Harry W. Hays, P.C., who spent his life in the service of agriculture. Elected to the House of Commons in 1963, he was Minister of Agriculture for Canada from 1963 to 1966. In his term as minister the policy for entry of the exotic breeds of cattle to Canada was established, as was the new classification for show ring standards. The display herds at the Central Experimental Farm in Ottawa were put in place, and the groundwork for the later introduction of the Canadian Dairy Commission and Canfarm was completed. He has one of the first and most successful promoters and exporters of Canadian breeds of livestock. As a rancher he developed the Hays' Converter breed of beef cattle. He was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture from May, 1980, until his death in May, 1982.

I want all honourable senators to know that Senator Hays put a great deal of work, time and effort into the studies leading up to this report, and into the report itself.

I want to give special thanks to the members of the committee who spent a great deal of their time and effort in travelling across Canada to attend public hearings and in attending the meetings of the committee in Ottawa. I would be remiss in my duty were I not to extend thanks and appreciation for a job well done to our two consultants, Mr. S. B. Williams and Mr.

Max Roytenberg. Mr. Williams, sharing his vast knowledge of Canadian agriculture, was invaluable to the committee. Mr. Roytenberg, of Roygold Marketing Systems, provided important data and advice to the committee.

The committee staff, Dr. Grant Carman, Sally Rutherford and Aileen Collins, worked long and hard in arranging for the committee hearings and in preparing this report. The clerk of the committee, Mr. John Desmarais, provided valuable assistance which was much appreciated. Last, but by no means least, our thanks go out to all of those organizations and individuals who made representations to the committee, whether in committee hearings or through the expression of their views in other ways.

Honourable senators, this is the second report that has been published by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture relating to the beef industry. The first was published on October 19, 1977, and was entitled, "Recognizing the Realities: A Beef Import Policy for Canada." The result of that report has been the approval by Parliament of an act to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat. This was only a step on the road to long term stabilization in the beef industry. There is still a long way to go.

• (1415)

The present report is the result of two years of further study with the purpose of trying to find answers to the many problems confronting the beef industry in Canada. If adopted as policy, this report will not solve all of the problems that face us, but may perhaps constitute a step which will give hope to the industry for long-term stability.

The beef industry has experienced financial hardship for many years, resulting in many producers having to liquidate their herds and leading to an increasing number of farm bankruptcies. Heavy losses in all segments of the industry have resulted in a diminishing of the demand for beef, the spiralling of costs, and high interest rates.

Producers themselves, and through their organizations, are divided as to where the real problem lies and what the solutions are. There has been, however, a noticeable change in producer attitudes in the last two years, in the sense that there now appears to be a general consensus in the industry that something has to be done by producers and governments to bring some long-term stability. Many representatives of the industry told us that something has to be done to achieve long-term stability, but the majority do not appear to want this at the cost of greater government control of the industry through supply management features.

The committee heard the views of producers, consumers, provincial ministers of agriculture, government officials, academics and business and trade officials. The committee learned two things: one, that the industry is in serious trouble; and, two, that there is no agreement on remedies for the industry's problems.

From the representations and facts obtained the committee formulated two principles on the basis of which conclusions should be formed. The first of these is that Canada must have a strong and viable beef industry. The benefits this industry generates for all Canadians are significant. The lost revenue and unutilized resources resulting from a weakened beef industry will cause great economic and social costs to Canada. Secondly, beef industry policy approaches must be flexible and developmental. This is necessary for us to provide a combination of approaches which encourage improvement of the existing institutional framework and measures which foster the long-term viability of the beef industry in ways which achieve general acceptance on the part of beef producers.

Based on these realities, and considering the differences of opinion among producers, your committee came to the conclusion that before new programs are implemented there must be a considerably greater advance towards a consensus in the industry than at present exists. As a vehicle to try to obtain greater consensus in the industry, to gather more information, and offer solutions to the problems, your committee recommends the following:

The establishment of a national beef producers agency through an amendment to the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, made up principally of producer representatives in close co-operation with provincial governments. It would not have price-setting or quota-granting powers, but would act on behalf of producers in a co-ordinating, informational and advisory role. The committee notes that such an agency could serve as the basis for a marketing board if producers should choose to take the step.

The mandate of the agency would include: the collection, collation and co-ordination of data and general information about the beef industry in Canada; the investigation of improved price discovery mechanisms and systems for the improvement of market information; the examination of industry/producer matters, such as the negotiation of grade price differentials and weight ranges; the monitoring and assessment of the impact of beef imports and exports; the investigation of forward contracting; the evaluation of the development of grading and livestock specifications; the development of a national beef promotional program; consultation and co-ordination with existing red and white meat producer agencies and institutions; and acting in an advisory capacity in the co-ordination of federal and provincial government activities in the same fields of interest.

The committee further recommends that the Government of Canada investigate the advisability of establishing income averaging programs, which would create a capital pool for beef operation financing at favourable interest rates.

We know, honourable senators, that this action in itself will not solve all the problems facing the beef industry; but we believe that this is an important step along the road to stability in the beef industry in Canada. I hope you will have a chance to study the report in detail.

On motion of Senator Bielish, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I ask the consent of honourable senators to make an announcement for which the Opposition has been asking for several days. It concerns the economic statement by the Minister of Finance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has just announced that he will be making an extremely important speech in the form of a budget on Monday evening, June 28.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am glad to hear that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are we going to offer our congratulations to Senator Phillips for getting action on his proposal?

Senator Olson: You may congratulate whomever you wish.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps we should congratulate you.

THE SENATE

COMMITTEES—REPRESENTATIONS BY PROVINCES—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday, July 14, 1982, I will move:

That whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a Committee of the Senate in which a province or provinces have a special interest, then as a general policy, the government of such province or provinces where practicable, shall be asked by the Committee as to whether or not they wish to make written and/or verbal representations to the Committee, and any province that replies in the affirmative shall be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.

I think I should explain to honourable senators that I really have no intention of moving that motion on July 14.

I shall wait until there has been a meeting of the chairmen of standing committees to consider this question. I hope they will express an opinion on it and other matters I have raised with them, and then I will proceed with the motion.

A meeting of committee chairmen was scheduled a week ago, but it had to be postponed. It does not appear as though we will be able to have that meeting before the summer recess, so I thought I should put this particular proposal on the public record. This is something that I have been advocating for some time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—REMOVAL OF MARTIAL LAW—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, you will recall that six months have passed since the imposition of martial law in Poland. Last week the President of the Canadian Polish Congress submitted to Parliament a petition signed by more than 40,000 Canadians opposing martial law in Poland, with its sad aftermath, and requesting the Polish government to allow a process of national reconciliation. Last week also a motion supporting this endeavour was adopted unanimously in the other place, so I intend to move a similar motion this afternoon.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), seconded by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., I move:

That in the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act, the Senate urge the Polish Government to remove martial law, release from detention Lech Walesa and other members of Solidarity, and commence negotiations with the Church and Solidarity to solve the political and economic problems plaguing Poland.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no.

I should like an opportunity to look at the motion. Senator Haidasz showed me the Notice of Motion at approximately 2.10 p.m., so I have not had an opportunity to study it. I suggest that it appear as if he had given notice in due course and that it appear under Motions at the next sitting, which will be tomorrow. I certainly have no difficulty in consenting to having it appear on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow.

● (1425)

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, leave is not granted. Does the Deputy Leader of the Government wish to make a formal proposal?

Senator Frith: Leave to move the motion today is not granted, but Senator Haidasz has given proper notice of motion and it will appear under Motions tomorrow.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As if he had given notice.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—TRANSFER OF 300 JOBS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The minister is probably aware that Ayerst-McKenna, the pharmaceutical manufacturer, has decided to move its research and development from Montreal to the United States, thereby transferring 300 jobs. In view of the fact that other pharmaceutical companies are seriously thinking of taking the same step, due to the government's policy as legislated in Bill C-102 of 1969—that is, in section 41(4) of the Patent Act, which says that anyone can apply to the Patent Commissioner for a compulsory licence to import or manufacture pharmaceutical products—will the minister tell us whether the government will consider amendments to the act in order to prevent other companies from following Ayerst McKenna's decision?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to take that question as notice, because I am reasonably sure that if the consequence of making some amendments would have the end result desired by my honourable friend, then we would want to give consideration to that. However, I would like to have a more detailed reply from the minister responsible for those patent rights.

Senator Charbonneau: I might add, for the information of the minister, although this is unofficial, that I understand the Quebec government is looking into the situation with a view to alleviating the problem.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister, following upon Senator Charbonneau's question. Would the minister, in obtaining information for Senator Charbonneau, find out exactly in what time period those research laboratories were established in Canada and whether or not Ayerst-McKenna at that time was a Canadian controlled company and whether or not control has changed since that time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that into account.

ANNOUNCED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, a few moments ago the Minister of State for Economic Development said that next week the Minister of Finance is going to make an economic statement or pronounce a semi-budget. I would like to know if the minister is ready to detail the kind of statement the Minister of Finance is going to make. Will it be a mini-budget or an economic statement?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I said that the Minister of Finance has announced that he will be making an important economic speech. I also said that it will be in the form of a budget next Monday evening, June 28.

Senator Asselin: If that is the case, can the minister tell us if the previous budget is going to be withdrawn?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has to understand that when a budget is brought in it supercedes all other budgets—last year's, the one before that, or whatever. A budget speech, of course, takes precedence over all previous budgets.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, can the minister say whether the tax bills now before Parliament are being withdrawn?

Senator Olson: The minister will say that the honourable senator will have to wait until Monday night to find out the contents of the Minister of Finance's speech.

[Translation]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—LIFTING OF SANCTIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. The countries of the European Community have announced they are raising the sanctions imposed on Argentina. I understand that Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated the government is preparing to do so as well. Can the Leader of the Government confirm or deny this?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I perceive that there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who, because of their protracted unemployment, are finding that their eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits is running out. Is it the government's intention to allow those people to go on welfare? If that is so, then it is not necessary for me to show that they will become a burden on the provinces and the municipalities. Does the government have any intention of increasing substantially the period during which unemployment insurance can be drawn?

• (1430)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, a number of matters respecting that are being considered by the ministers involved. We recognized the intense severity of that problem.

Senator Donahoe: May I pose a supplementary question? Among the matters being considered this may be one of them, but if the government does opt for the latter of the two courses

I described, what then does it intend to do about the fund under the Unemployment Insurance Act which will, on the basis of current contributions and payouts, run dry very shortly? Has any consideration been given to improving the standing of that fund?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is, I think, an obligation on the part of the government to provide sufficient funds for the statutory payments to be made to those who have entitlement. But if the senator's next question is whether we are going to bring in proposals to change the level of contributions into the fund, that, of course, is another matter. Perhaps I have to give the standard answer, which my honourable friend knows, and that is that when the ministers directly responsible are ready to make an announcement about it they will make it, and I will give an undertaking to bring that information to the attention of my honourable friend as soon as possible.

PARLIAMENT

SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the announcement made by Senator Olson with regard to the budget to be presented next week by the Minister of Finance, is the Leader of the Government or the deputy leader in a position to tell us if the objective of adjourning for the summer on June 30 remains the same?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as my information is concerned, that is still the target date.

Senator Flynn: There would be approximately two days to debate that budget in the other place, and in this place we would have the advantage of listening to the Leader of the Government on the same topic.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thought the question was: Does the government still intend to try to adjourn on June 30? My answer is that the government is working towards that end, but it may not be possible because there will not be enough time to debate that or other measures. But it is still the target date.

Senator Flynn: I was wondering if there was an announcement made at the same time in the other place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a result of the Minister of Finance's statement and presentation of the budget on Monday, there will be, I understand, a full budget debate, and we will then see the effect that may have on the ultimate summer recess.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

COMMON STOCK OWNERSHIP—SUGGESTED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL INCENTIVE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question raised on May 26 by Senator Murray relating to federal-provincial incentive in common stock ownership. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

[Senator Donahoe.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will know that there has been no definite proposal received by the federal government from the Government of Ontario respecting a federal-provincial incentive for promoting common stock ownership. The government would certainly be willing to discuss such a proposal with Ontario if it was brought forward.

The government supports stock ownership and the present tax system contains important incentives to this end. The dividend gross-up and tax credit mechanism reduces the tax payable by individuals on dividends by one-half. Its attractiveness was increased in 1977 when the rate of gross-up and tax credit was increased from 33½ per cent to 50 per cent of dividends received. This type of mechanism does not exist in the United States. The effective tax rate on capital gains on stocks in Canada was covered by the inclusion of only one-half of gains in income. The top marginal tax rate on capital gains was further reduced in 1982 from approximately 33 per cent to 25 per cent as a result of the general lowering of the personal marginal tax rates in November 12, 1982 budget.

REPORT OF SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question raised by Senator Smith on May 19 about the Science Council of Canada report entitled "Planning Now for an Information Society." The answer is rather lengthy, and I ask permission to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Government realizes the tremendous potential of information technology and has developed two technologies which are entirely dependant on microelectronics: Telidon and communication satellites.

The Telidon program is intended to encourage the creation of a videotext industry in Canada which will capture a significant share of the world market.

Canada led the world in communications technology with the launching of the Alouette I in 1962. This early lead has been actively pursued since then and, last December, the Minister of State for Science and Technology announced that the space budget would increase by about 40% so that total federal expenditures on space, between 1981 and 1985, would be just under $500 million.

The Government of Canada has invested in many areas of the new technology. This economic strategy was reconfirmed in the document "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980's".

The Government has allotted $14.5 million for the Office Communication Systems program to ensure that Canadian manufacturers can capture, not only a significant portion of the domestic market of office equipment, but can also expand into foreign markets.

Finally, last January the Government announced an expanded support program of $93 million for microelectronics. The program, Support for Technology Enhanced Productivity, a major extension of the Special Electronics Fund, will operate during the next three years and will promote the manufacture and use of microelectronics in Canadian industry. This program will help finance feasibility studies and it will support the incorporation of microelectronics into products or manufacturing processes and the design of custom micro-circuits.

As part of this program, ten microelectronics centres will be set up in different universities. These centres are intended to develop and maintain an outstanding technical competence in microelectronics. In addition, they will provide training in the application of microelectronics and will offer technical assistance to local industries in the application of microelectronics to their products and manufacturing processes.

In response to Senator Smith's criticism of the state of research in high technology, I would like to point out that on the contrary Canada has made considerable progress in recent years and can be proud of the achievements which have resulted from government initiatives and private sector entrepreneurial spirit.

I have already mentioned that we are recognized world leaders in telecommunications technology. Canada has an impressive record for innovation in the fields of telecommunication chips, fiber optics technology, video systems and certain areas of computer technology.

The Government of Canada is determined to develop the new technologies for Canada's future prosperity. It is also concerned with the societal impacts of this new technology.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has launched a number of labour adjustment programs to support the counselling, training and mobility needs which may result from technological change. The Industrial and Labour Adjustment program introduced in 1981 also provides a range of industry and labour adjustment support services.

More recently, the Minister of Labour announced the establishment of a Task Force on microelectronics technology to examine the status, implications and extent to which this technology is used in industries under Canadian labour-code jurisdiction.

As you can see, the Government is indeed aware of the importance of the new technologies to this country's future and it is determined to continue the promotion of high technology.

THE BUDGET

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question raised on November 17, 1981 by Senator Murray related to the economic development envelope. This is a long and detailed answer, and I ask permission for that answer to be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I have reviewed the relationship between the Economic Development Envelope projections of planned expenditures contained in the 1980 budget and those given in the 1981 budget and have confirmed that Senator Murray's calculations with respect to reductions in the envelope are invalid. There has not been a reduction of $400 million as he alleged.

In addition to its principal functions in providing resources for economic development activities the Economic Development Envelope was assigned accounting and control responsibility for parts of the Western Development Fund as the Minister of Finance explained in both budget presentations.

There has been no reduction in the funds provided for economic development. As I reported to honourable senators in March 1981 in connection with the differences between the 1980 budget and the 1981-82 Main Estimates, the differences are matters of accounting practice and display rather than content. The 1981-82 Main Estimates and the new 1981 budget include the effects of repayments by crown corporations and others amounting to $205 million in 1981-82 and $211 million in 1982-83 not offset by new loans. The 1980 budget showed the gross amounts of loans made and the envelope levels were therefore higher by these amounts. In other words the apparent reduction does not represent a reduction in overall spending but simply an accounting transaction which offsets a portion of the gross expenditures within the envelope by crediting revenues arising from loan repayments. Taking account of this change in display, provision for economic development increased from $6600 million to $6619 million in 1981-82 and from $7157 to $7377 in 1982-83 between the two budgets.

With respect to the Western Development Fund, the Minister of Finance stated in the other place on November 12, 1981 that planned expenditures from the fund had been reprofiled as a consequence of the larger sums flowing to the provinces through the conclusion of energy agreements. Allocations from the fund have been made for western transportation initiatives in coming years. In addition allocations have been made to the Social Affairs Envelope to meet the economic development objectives of native people.

In summary, then, economic development per se has not been reduced and there has been a reprofiling of Western Development Fund expenditures.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the estimates was printed as an appendix to yesterday's Debate of the Senate.

Briefly, dealing with the main estimates, the budget requirements for the year ending March 31, 1983 are $72.935 billion. We add to that loans, investments and advances of $1.218 billion, bringing the total of the main estimates to $74.153 billion.

The government does create reserves which are added to those estimates and which will be brought into the spending by supplementary estimates through the course of the year. These reserves are under statutory programs in the amount of $530 million, and reserves for the increase in the various envelopes which govern our spending of $3.327 billion. That projects a total for estimates for the 1982-83 year of $78.010 billion as compared to the comparable figure for the previous year of $70.109 billion.

We have already had supplementary estimates (A) in the amount of $114 million, bringing the expenditure under the main estimates to $74.267 billion, although that does not increase the total projected estimates of $78 billion because the supplementary estimate was taken from the envelope reserve.

I should like to deal very briefly with the total estimated outlays for the year, which is what senators will really be interested in. The projected total estimates, as I stated, are $78.010 billion, but that amount has to be reduced by an estimate of the lapses in spending that will take place in this fiscal year of $1.230 billion, and the repayment of previously made loans in the amount of $480 million. That means that the total estimated outlays for the 1982-83 year will be $76.3 billion, up from $68.3 billion the previous year. What that means is an increase in total outlays projected of 11.7 per cent from year to year.

It is interesting to note that the person-years will, on a comparable basis to last year, aggregate 255,322. That is an increase of 2,152 person-years from year to year, or an increase of eight-tenths of 1 per cent.

Honourable senators will be aware that a considerably greater amount of information is provided under the estimates than was provided before. First of all, there is available a guide to the estimates of the Government of Canada which gives readers an idea of how the estimates are set up and how the spending of the Government of Canada is ordered. There is another book entitled "1982-83 Estimates, the Government's Expenditure Plan." This gives the government's five-year projected expenditure plan details that are broken down under the heading of the various envelopes, and considerable additional analysis. Also included is the blue book of estimates which senators have been used to in the past. Finally, interestingly enough, there are ten booklets that give detailed expenditures for the organization of various government programs. This is a great increase in the amount of information that is available to Parliament on the spending of government. For this, I think we have to congratulate both sides of the house. When they were in power, the Conservatives did much to bring about this new approach to spending and the provision of more information. The present government under the Honourable Donald Johnston has continued that initiative begun by the Conservatives.

In the course of examining the estimates, we looked at the matter of the control of loan guarantees and letters of comfort. We reviewed the processes by which the government monitors its loan guarantees. We found that where the government has an equity interest, it monitors its loans and guarantees through the appointment of directors, and that where there is no equity interest, it has a monitoring process which consists of reports and budgets being given to the responsible ministers. We were informed that the government is introducing legislation in the near future to improve the monitoring process.

We also had a look at letters of comfort. Honourable senators will be aware that letters of comfort are undertakings that are not specific guarantees. Letters of comfort are replaced later by guarantees, but, at the point of issuance, they are nothing more than a commitment by the government. However, the President of the Treasury Board admitted to the committee that that commitment is almost in the form of a guarantee. He agreed to provide the committee with a list of the outstanding letters of comfort going back five years, showing all the letters of comfort that have been issued in that period and the time lapse between the issuance of the letter of comfort and the eventual putting in place of the guarantee. The President of the Treasury Board agreed to shorten the time between the issuance of the letter of comfort and the issuance of the guarantee. The committee brought to his attention the fact that it was its opinion that letters of comfort should be shown as a contingent liability of the government. The minister gave no undertaking in regard to this suggestion, but he was obviously impressed by it.

Finally, in examining of the estimates, the committee looked at the correlation between interest rates and exchange rates. A number of the witnesses discussed this topic, and I have to say that there was no particular consensus between the witnesses, as honourable senators might expect, but there were some interesting points made. One of those points, for example, was that the level of exchange rates should reflect the relative rates of inflation, real and perceived, between countries. It is true that interest rates affect flows between countries, and that those flows will affect the exchange rate.

It is also true, as witnesses pointed out to us, that the Canadianization policies under the National Energy Program caused money to leave the country, increased the demand for credit and had some effect on the exchange rate. The fact is, however, that those are aberrations, and over the long period the exchange rate will reflect the correlation between relative inflation rates and expectations of inflation rates in various countries.

It is interesting to know—and it was brought to our attention by two witnesses—that the inflation rate in Canada is overstated by as much as three to four per cent. If we were to establish our consumer price index on the same statistical basis as that used in the United States, we would find that instead of showing an inflation rate of roughly 11 per cent, we would be in the neighbourhood of six to seven per cent. The reason for that is that the United States takes its inflation figures on a monthly basis to the twelfth power. We take our inflation figures on an annual basis. In addition, the United States takes the current mortgage rate that exists at that time, while, on the other hand, we take a five-year moving average of mortgage rates.

This means that the Americans are more sensitive to inflation price movements than we are. When prices and wages are going up, they reflect it much quicker, and when they are going down they reflect the reduction much quicker.

Our witnesses, with one notable exception, had little enthusiasm for wage and price controls. One of them, a leading economist, was of the opinion that the increases in wages and prices were, and will be, on the decline. It was interesting to note—and this was brought to our attention—that when we are able to hold the exchange rate at the level that we held it at before this latest drop, we will, in fact, in economic terms, be importing the wage discipline that is being employed in the United States. Now that the dollar is dropping we are in danger of losing that discipline, and that is based on the fact that our export industry will find it a great deal easier to avoid labour strife by paying higher wages.

While our witnesses were against the idea of comprehensive wage and price controls, they were generally in favour of an incomes policy for the public sector. One witness, Mr. J. W. Burns, President of Power Corporation, gave us some interesting information on the effect of inflation on borrowing and planning. He pointed out that in this inflationary environment, it is virtually impossible to get long-term money at a fixed interest rate, and he graphically outlined for us the effect that that had on corporate planning and corporate investment decisions.

A number of witnesses said that we ought to have a more reasonable definition of money supply, but there was no agreement on what that definition should be. Honourable senators will be interested to know that the Bank of Canada itself is having trouble with this particular problem and keeps shifting, as it did in its most recent report this week, what it puts into its definition of M-1. Dr. MacIntosh, the President of the Canadian Banker's Association, outlined an interesting scenario, which is included in the report, on how difficult, if not impossible, it would be to institute foreign exchange controls in Canada.

Honourable senators, that generally deals with some of the issues that were raised by our witnesses. The report is available for honourable senators to look at, if they want an enlargement of the points I raised.

I would like to conclude my remarks with some views of my own that arise out of our examination, and having been exposed to the witnesses who came before the committee. It has always been a question as to whether we should really try to reduce inflation. People are inclined to say, "Well, inflation hasn't been all that bad and most people have prospered rather than suffered under inflation, so why not let there be a certain amount of controlled inflation?" There are very valid reasons for not permitting that to happen. In the first place, nobody in history has been able to control the rate of inflation. If inflation cannot be reduced to a rate of less than three per cent, there is no reason to think that it can be held at 10 per cent, 20 per cent or 30 per cent. Once moving, inflation tends to move away from you, if you accept the fact that it is just going to exist.

The difficulty with inflation is that it creates a very short-term time frame. As Mr. Burns pointed out, you cannot think in terms of long-term money or rates being locked in for a long term. All you can think of is short-term money—one-year and two-year mortgages and floating rates. Everybody stops thinking in the long term, which is essential to good investment, and starts thinking in the very short and medium term.

• (1450)

Worse than that, investors move away from productive investments to investments that they perceive will protect them against inflation. They move into gold, paintings, land and things such as stamps and comic books—things that have nothing or very little to do with productive investment.

Eventually—and it is historically true—inflation allowed to proceed ends in a disaster, and very often a disaster that destroys the social fabric of the country. There is no question that, regardless of what is happening today, regardless of how much we are suffering, we still have to act to end inflation.

How do we do that? I think it is clear and that very few would disagree with the fact that expectations of continuing inflation have to be lowered. That means that there is no easy way of getting out of this cycle. It takes time and it takes guts.

We have had an almost runaway inflationary economy for a number of years, perhaps up to 10 years. We cannot get out of that just by saying that it has to disappear; we have to take the kind of brutal actions that we are taking today. It is true that if we take those actions we run the risk of a loss of confidence and we run the risk of a disaster.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You already have.

Senator Everett: No, we are not there yet, but we are close. That is the risk we take.

The option is continuing inflation that will get worse and worse. Everyone is trying to avoid the hard, harsh choice. Everyone is coming up with nostrums: Balance the budget and it will be all over. Get rid of fear and your problems will disappear. End the NEP; reduce tax; lower interest rates.

Everyone of those suggestions may well be a valid medium-term policy option that would make the economy work better. If they were in place, or had been in place a number of years ago, they would make the adjustment process that is so painful now much more efficient than it is. But not only those changes would do it; many other changes would make the adjustment process work faster. The end of marketing boards, a valid, sound competitive policy, the end of union intransigence—all those things would make it easier.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What about the NEP?

Senator Everett: I said that the NEP is one that would make it easier.

But do not confuse those changes with an end to inflation. They are medium- to long-term policies that can be put in place and will take a long time to have effect. There is only one way out of this problem, and that is to lower demand because it is a fact that you cannot increase supply fast enough to meet demand that is not restrained. Demand will always increase faster than supply.

Let us look at some of those items. A number of businessmen say, "Let's balance the budget, and it will be all over; we won't have a problem any more." Their argument is that the demand for funds keeps interest rates high and causes crowding out. I suggest to you that we are going to see otherwise. I believe that what will happen, first in the United States and later in Canada, is that aggregate demand will reduce and the requirements of government will be accommodated without an increase in interest rates and, in fact, will be accommodated at a very much lower interest rate than we have today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is, demand for money and not consumer demand?

Senator Everett: That is correct, demand for money.

I do not know if honourable senators have given this matter thought, but it is very interesting to note that in every other downturn we have had we have had cries for increased spending and greater deficits and yet, as we face this situation, the cry is for a balanced budget. It is quite fascinating how we have changed our thinking.

At the time we started these hearings, we had a call for lower interest rates. No doubt honourable senators will remember all the provincial premiers and many people on the other side calling for lower interest rates and to accept a lower exchange rate. We do not hear much about that suggestion any more because, obviously, we have found that we can have a lower exchange rate at higher interest rates. If the government had taken the advice to lower the interest rates, we would not be looking at a 76-cent dollar; we might well be looking at a 60-cent or a 50-cent dollar.

Senator Asselin: They should have taken our advice to produce a new budget.

Senator Everett: There are others who say that the NEP is the cause of all the problems.

Senator Flynn: Yes, part of it, but not all of it.

Senator Everett: There are those in Calgary who say that the NEP is the cause of all our problems. What is interesting is that the oil companies in Alberta went on a buying spree of land, assets and drilling rights based on their perception of what was going to happen to the oil price. When they turned out to be wrong and found that they had over-paid for what they had, that they had borrowed money on floating rates, and that they were caught in the classic squeeze of a long-term, low-producing investment against a short-term, high-rate borrowing, then they turned around and blamed the NEP. There may be things wrong with the NEP, but the NEP is not the cause of many of the problems the oil industry is beefing about today.

Senator Flynn: It was the delay in bringing it about.

Senator Everett: What about the exchange rate? Senator Olson has been making a very good point. There is no question that our dollar has been dropping, but our dollar has stayed in line with virtually every currency other than the American dollar. What we are looking at is the world-wide strength of the American dollar.

I do not know if honourable senators realize that all of a sudden we have moved into a surplus on our current account at the last report. I would not bet on a lower dollar. I think a lot of people who today are going out and moving their funds down to the United States will find themselves in the same position as the people who went out and bought gold when it was $800 or $850 an ounce. I would not bet on a lower dollar.

Finally, we are confronted with all sorts of suggestions of what ought to happen. The wildest was made yesterday. I quote from the newspaper article which stated:

The Conservative motion had urged the government to lower interest rates, stimulate jobs, strengthen the dollar and lower the inflation rate.

If you lower the interest rate, then you will reduce the dollar, not strengthen it. If you stimulate jobs, you will create more inflation, not lessen it. If you strengthen the dollar, you are going to increase interest rates and you are going to do the opposite of stimulating jobs. How anyone can suggest, as a policy, "Lower the inflation rate," absolutely mystifies me.

● (1500)

We have listened to all of the ideas that have been put forward on what the government ought to do to solve this problem. I say to honourable senators that the government ought to continue what it is doing today, namely, to support the monetary policies of the Bank of Canada. There may be many things wrong with gradualism, but gradualism is working. Inflation is being drained out of the economy. There are risks attached to what the government is doing, but it is working.

If the opposition had any wit at all, it would let the process continue, because it is working. If it is left to proceed the way it is going we will achieve, as they will in the United States, a growing economy with very little or no inflation.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: I wonder if I might ask a question of the honourable gentleman. As a preface to the question, I will say that I have listened, as I am sure every honourable senator has, with intense interest to the eloquent and lucid statement made by the Honourable Senator Everett.

There is, however, one point on which I am unclear. I understood him to say that, if Canada uses the same criteria as the United States has used in assessing inflation, instead of coming up with 11 per cent we will find that our inflation rate is something like 6 or 7 per cent. Am I correct in inferring from that statement that, in reality, it is not costing us 11 per cent more this year, which was the figure issued this past week, but only 7 per cent?

Senator Everett: That would depend, honourable senator, on which definition is used. The point made by both Dr. Courchene and Dr. MacIntosh was that, if we used the same statistical method as is used by the Americans to arrive at the consumer price index, our rate would be three to four percentage points lower than that shown. Whether Canadians or Americans use the right statistical method is open to debate. It was mentioned only because everybody has said, "Well, look at the terrific job the Americans are doing in reducing their inflation." Dr. Courchene and Dr. MacIntosh were simply saying, "Don't be fooled."

The statistical method of arriving at the CPI in Canada is quite different from that used in the United States. If we were to use the method used in the United States, it is claimed that our inflation rate would be 3 to 4 per cent lower.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must say that I am inspired by Senator Everett's speech to make some observations in the course of this debate this afternoon. It is not so much that I find myself opposed to the flow of his ideas, because Senator Everett can always be relied upon to give a careful and reasoned exposition of his views, and they are to be respected. I certainly approach anything that I have to say with that thought in mind. He is an excellent chairman of the committee on which I have the honour to sit, and I am glad to pay my compliments to him in that respect.

Honourable senators, I am not going to cover the waterfront the way he did. I simply want to raise a couple of points which I think require some further development if we are to get a balanced view of the problem that lies before us.

In passing—and perhaps I might make a comment on the inflation rate question that was raised by Senator Rowe,—I, too, have heard the explanation that, if the inflation rate of our two countries were calculated on the same basis, they might be closer together than they are now. That may well be the case. I merely observe, however, that, in the last 12 months or so the American inflation rate—which was as high as ours and perhaps a little higher at times—has come down in an absolutely extraordinary fashion to some 3 per cent at the present time. American mortgage rates, however, have not fallen to the same extent. In fact, I do not think they have fallen to any great degree at all. Therefore, whatever else might account for any difference between the American and Canadian inflation rates, it crosses my mind that mortgage rates may not be the reason for the differential.

I admit that this view was placed before the committee by distinguished economists, as Senator Everett has reported. When I reflect, however, upon what I believe to be the facts—namely, that the American mortgage rate did not go down appreciably but that the rate of inflation certainly did go down to perhaps a quarter or a third of what it was—then I have to believe there were other factors involved besides that one. I am sorry that I cannot clear up the mystery at this particular time, but I can say that I approach this explanation for the difference between our two inflation rates with some caution. I am not convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that that is indeed the major reason for the change, if there are reasons of other kinds. I offer that caveat in comparing the situations that exist in the two countries.

Senator Everett gave us what I think is a very useful and thought-provoking analysis of the way in which we should try to approach the problem of inflation in this country. I think he made an excellent start when he referred to the expectations of people. It seems that it is often thought that if we could only reduce expectations—which means what working people are thinking about, or what people who have mortgages are thinking about, or what businessmen are thinking about—the problem would be solved. Perhaps it would, but we have to ask a prior question: Why are their expectations so perverse as to envision continued inflation? The answer to that question has to be the cold, hard voice of experience. That is what these people have seen.

If honourable senators will allow me to express my own view, one of the important factors of that expectation is the performance of the government. While we have a strong monetary policy—perhaps too strong in respect of the leadership that the Bank of Canada is displaying to the country—I am afraid that I cannot detect the same dedication to restraint in the fiscal policy of the government that has been before us in these past few years. I do not know what we will hear on Monday, but so far the fiscal restraint stance of the federal government obviously has not inspired the businessmen or the working community of Canada to think that the government itself is taking that attitude towards inflation—the very attitude which might entitle them to change their expectations.

It seems to me, therefore, that while expectations are an important factor in this matter, unless we see leadership on the side of government with respect to dealing with that subject, we cannot really blame anybody who thinks that inflation will continue. It does appear that it will. Prophecy is a gratuitous exercise, but I do not perceive, at the present time, any good reason to think that inflation will come down very quickly in Canada. I say that with the greatest regret. I acknowledge that there are many factors involved and that it would not be fair to say that the government fiscal policy is the only reason behind it. It is an important reason, in my opinion, but let us assume that there are others. The outlook is certainly not encouraging, from my point of view.

From that standpoint, then, I think that the senator's reference to "brutal" action being needed in order to tackle the inflationary problem is questionable. I do not know whether we need more of what we have now. I think that it is brutal enough at the present time. I am at a loss to understand this concept that one of the keys to beating inflation is to lower demand. I am at a loss to understand how that brutal action will lead to lower demand.

Senator Frith: He did not refer to lower consumer demand.

Senator Roblin: My note tells me that that is what the honourable senator said. I believe that we had two discussions, one regarding lower consumer demand and the other regarding lower demand in the capital market. I am talking about lower consumer demand, and I hope that I have heard my honourable friend correctly. He left me with the impression that the pressure of the consumer demand upon the productive resources of the country today is boosting inflation. I cannot see that. The capacity of the industrial structure of this country is not stretched—far from it. The industrial capacity of this country is limping along on one foot. It is working at approximately 65 per cent of the manufacturing capacity as last I saw the figure. When one looks at the productive capacity of other sectors of the economy, such as the mining or the forest industry—and, indeed, in Alberta these days the oil industry—one cannot really say that the pressure of demand is forcing inflation up.

I do not think, therefore, that we are in a typical situation of demand pressure forcing prices and inflation up in this country. If there is any force in this country which is driving prices up, it has to be interest. It has to be the real engine of inflation in Canada at this particular moment in time.

The solution to the problem is not simple. The honourable senator pointed that out, and I heartily agree with him. It is a very difficult question. I cannot accept the view, however, that pressure of demand is a factor in inflation these days, and that we should indulge in more brutal activity to have more unemployed and less demand in order to bring this inflationary factor down within reasonable scope. Heaven knows we are looking at bankruptcies which exceed anything we have seen in recent times. We are looking at a rate of unemployment which is over 10 per cent. We are looking at an idle industrial machine which is working at far below its capacity. While I am not going to proceed from that statement to say that you should follow Walter Gordon in reinflating the economy in the way he would like us to, I do not think that those factors can be blamed for inflation or that it is necessary to have more brutal action on the part of the federal government to redeem the situation.

● (1510)

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: When did he say that?

Senator Roblin: I took the words down as he was speaking, and "brutal action needed" is my note.

Senator Lamontagne: Walter Gordon said that?

Senator Roblin: Oh no, not Walter Gordon. He has another slant entirely. He is on the other side of the argument.

Perhaps Senator Lamontagne, whose economic views are well respected in this country, will explain Walter Gordon's view to us—

Senator Flynn: Up to now he has disagreed with it.

Senator Roblin: —because I do not think it fits very well with Senator Everett's view, and I am not sure that I would endorse it entirely myself. That, however, is a side issue. We are talking about ways of restraining inflation.

We are told that the deficit really does not matter. That is probably not a fair way to put it, but we are told that we should not be straining to reduce the deficit, and I can see the argument on that side. Heaven knows, if restraining the deficit were to tighten the screws on the operation of the economy, then I would be hoist with my own petard, talking about the economy not working at full force, and if the deficit bears on that matter it has to be weighed in the balance.

But there are other considerations as well, for example, that we have a deficit now which is going to be about $18 billion. If one translates that into American terms, it comes out at $180 billion. They are turning themselves inside out over a deficit that is slightly over half that amount, and yet we seem to be happy to carry on with that in mind. The consequences, however, are what count, and there are several consequences, I suggest, that arise.

First, as long as you use the Bank of Canada as the financing system to raise the money to meet this deficit, you inevitably import a little more inflation into the currency of the country. Governor Bouey does not agree with that, but I think that if you searched hard you could find reasons to think that there is some merit in that point of view. Not that all of it is inflationary, but some of it is—the part that is monetized by the bank itself.

The second consequence is that we encumber our annual income, the revenues of the Government of Canada, with the burden of paying the interest on that debt, which prevents the government from doing the other things they would like to do. Right now it is about 23 cents on the dollar to pay the interest on the debt alone. After we have succeeded in borrowing another $10 billion, let us say, to bridge the cash gap in our national finances, will it be 25 cents on the dollar that we have to pay in interest? And how much of that, these days, is going outside the country? I suggest that in the light of the recent fate of government borrowings in the Canadian market, that is not altogether out of the question.

[Senator Roblin.]

It seems to me, therefore, that the question of the deficit is important. There is a point of balance here. We have gone overboard. The deficit cannot be eliminated, but surely it can be made more manageable and less of a burden on the capital-raising structure of the country, and on the national budget itself.

Senator Everett raised another interesting point that I would like to debate with him, and that has to do with his view—I think I have it right—that if we tighten the screws the capital demand for money will be reduced. I presume he means by that that demands for capital from the private sector will be reduced, and that if that happens there will be sufficient elbow room in the capital-raising sector to provide the money required to support the deficit.

Well, perhaps that is so, but what grounds have we for thinking so? Every company in this country today that borrows money has got to borrow it on a short-term basis. Perhaps a few don't, but I do not know who they are. The requirements of the private sector are increasing at a time when business is not very strong, which seems contrary to all the rules; yet, we know that it is increasing borrowing in the banking sector, in the short-term money market, because they have to fund their debts. They have to fund their low cash flows, with 66 per cent going to pay the bank interest. They have to borrow to finance their other operations. The demand for money is not falling, and I do not think it will. Even if it did, however, what would it indicate? To me it would indicate that either they have gone bankrupt, and do not have to pay the money back to the banks any more, or else that the state of the economy is so weak that no one would want to borrow any money for investment. I do not really think that that is a recipe for the country that I would be prepared to endorse.

The exchange rate has come into the discussion. I have a view of the exchange rate which perhaps not many people agree with, but I think that there are more factors at work in the exchange rate than what the Americans are doing, or than what the interest rates are in the United States. I think that one of the important factors in the exchange rate is the essential strength of the Canadian dollar. Senator Everett mentioned that in talking about the balance of current payments, and he has a very good point there; but it seems to me that other factors have weakened the Canadian dollar. The flight of currency from this country in 1981, which I hope to goodness has stopped, though I have no recent figures, was in the form of a haemorrhage.

When you get that kind of thing happening your dollar is going to be weak. When you have foreigners who do not want to invest in your country—and that is what we have today—you are going to have a dollar that is weak. If you have an international community that thinks that this is a poor place for investment, you have a dollar that is going to be weak. Regardless of what other factors there may be in the market, those factors are important, and cannot be overlooked.

Therefore, I say that the exchange rate, among other things, reflects the status of our dollar in the opinion of the money markets of the world, and it seems to me that we appear to be depicted as a country whose dollar is weak for good and sufficient domestic reasons.

These are some of the points that I felt constrained to speak to at this present time, but I do not feel that I should leave the matter there. It is simple to have a theoretical argument with my friend about what is good and what is bad, and I have to admit that there are arguments on both sides of this question. I do not pretend to be the ultimate word on such matters either, because I know that I am not; but one has to say, "Well, Roblin, if all these things you are saying are true, what are you going to do about them? Are we just going to sit and wait for it to pass? Are we going to blame it on the Americans?"

I do not think I would be content to do that. But I have to say that if I have any prescription at all, I agree heartily with what Senator Everett indicated to us, namely, that there is no quick fix, there is no easy answer. The things that we should do are going to take time to be reflected. I do not think it can be any other way. I would say that the principal point of attack would be to restore the confidence of the people of Canada and the international investment and trading community in this country as a place to invest and a place to create jobs.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: How is that to be done? I do not know how it is to be done, but I can offer a couple of suggestions that I think might be useful.

Take the National Energy Program. I am sympathetic with those who want to make sure that the Canadian people benefit from the uncovenanted rise in the price of oil due to OPEC. I do not think that there is anybody in the country who objects to our getting our fair share of that incremental value. I do not think that there is anybody in the country who thinks that self-sufficiency is unnecessary or a poor thing. We all want that. I think that those goals of the National Energy Program are important and should not be in any way departed from. In the course of carrying out the policy, however, a few things have been done—and we know what they are, for they have been before us many times—that to my mind have unnecessarily damaged our reputation as a country with which people feel they can deal competently, and a country whose rules of the game are stable and will not be changed retroactively or arbitrarily. It really does not matter whether we change them arbitrarily or retroactively, but if the appearance is that we have, then the damage has been done, and I think such damage has been done.

You know what the points are. They have to do with the 25 per cent back-in on the Canada lands, and if you do have a back-in you should provide reasonable compensation. The Senate committee dealt with Bill C-48, and found that we have been acting retroactively in the 25 per cent back-in, and that we have not given full compensation. Policies of that kind should never have been allowed to arise. Furthermore, with the way in which we take money from the energy system and place it in the national treasury, we insist on being front-end loaders. Every time one does that, one makes the whole system a hostage to changes in the international price of oil, which no one can forecast or foresee. We certainly did not foresee any decreases.

● (1520)

Senator Everett made a good point when he said that many of the people in the oil business made the same mistake that the Government of Canada made in thinking that oil prices would never go down. This has to be taken into account when we listen to their complaints about what is going on. Even so, the National Energy Program, by the principle of front-end loading, did one significant thing that has nothing to do with the price of oil per se, and that is that it depleted the cash flow. When the cash flow position is as vulnerable as it is in the oil industry, which lives on cash flow, one can expect trouble, and that is exactly what has happened.

If we could change the impact of the national energy tax program from front-end loading to something else, we might find that we would be clear of a lot of these difficulties.

So I say that the National Energy Program is one program which need not be abandoned—I do not expect that—but which could be altered to good effect. I say the same thing with respect to FIRA. In principle, the idea of trying to undergird and support the Canadian nature of our industry and economy is good. What Canadian would object to that? We want to see that done as far as we can do it, for we know that we have gone too far in the branch-plant system due to circumstances of other days. FIRA, in principle, is something which I do not think even the most rabid, macho free enterpriser in this country or anywhere else would object to if it operated properly.

As I have said before, and at the risk of boring honourable senators, the trouble with FIRA is that its activities appear to be conducted behind a veil. Its activities seem to be without structured rules that ordinary people can discern. Its decisions are rendered behind a veil of bureaucratic secrecy, filtered through some cabinet decision or other, and the people who look at it from the outside, whether they get by FIRA or not, detect a certain lack of “due process”, if I may use that American phrase. If we could reform FIRA to show that there is a due process, that it is not a Star Chamber, that it is not a bureaucratic invention designed to be unkind to foreigners, but a genuine institution to protect Canadian economic interests, then I think we could sell it to other people and it would be far more palatable to us at home.

Senator Frith: Of benefit to Canada rather than Canadian economic interests. Do you mean that in terms of the overall?

Senator Roblin: Take it either way. The point I am trying to make is that these things should be done because it is hoped that they will restore confidence in the country, which I think is desirable.

Now, we have heard the great news from Senator Olson that we will have a new budget. We hope to have a budget which, instead of being hostile to savings, hostile to growth, hostile to small business and hostile to the accumulation of capital, plugs legitimate loopholes, and there are some of those of which none of us approve. We should plug those loopholes. That will do the job and will not interfere with the general interest of the economic system in the way the current budget is perceived.

Perhaps those three examples are sufficient.

I would not say to honourable senators that, if they took every word of my prescription and followed it faithfully, the sun would rise tomorrow morning and there would be no clouds in the sky. We are going to have clouds in the sky in this country for some time, but if we can start the process of re-establishing confidence in the integrity of our economy insofar as foreigners are concerned, in the integrity of our economy insofar as domestic investors are concerned, in making people feel that this is a place where growth is appreciated, a place where intervention is waning and not waxing, that we will withdraw from those areas of the economy which we should never try to control anyway and concentrate on the ones in which government has a real business to act in the interest of those who cannot help themselves, then I think we will go a long way towards setting the stage for a return to normality, lower inflation, lower interest rates, more jobs and better production in this country. That is a contribution I make with all humility, being aware of the difficulties of the problem. That is just a suggestion as to what we might do if we are to move in this field.

I apologize to honourable senators. My remarks are entirely extemporaneous and if, after I have read the “blues”, I see that I have not made much sense, I will not be a bit surprised.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The chairman referred to the manner in which the Americans compute their inflation rate. If I understood him correctly, he suggested that Canadians should do likewise. He said that if we were to do that, the current inflation rate would be much more favourable than it is. Currently, the inflation rate is hovering around 11.5 per cent.

Senator Asselin: That will not change the facts.

Senator Bosa: It will not change the facts?

Senator Asselin: No, not at all.

Senator Bosa: I am not advocating that. I am merely putting a question to Senator Everett.

The inflation rate for the month of April was 0.5 per cent. If we were to project our inflation rate in the same manner as the Americans, that would mean we would have had an annual inflation rate of 6 per cent.

If the average inflation rate is now 11.5 per cent, there must be some months when the rate is above 6 or 7 per cent, as is the situation now. What impact would an inflation rate of 15, 16 or 17 per cent have on the rest of the economy, or on mortgage rates, if it were computed as the Americans compute theirs?

Senator Asselin: That would not change the value of the dollar.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, my explanation was probably lacking in some way. I do not believe I ever suggested we compute our CPI on the same basis as the Americans. I leave that open to statisticians and people who deal with those sorts of things.

All I said was that they compute their inflation rate on a different basis and, therefore, they are far more reflective of the current situation than we in Canada are. We take an annual figure, and in the case of mortgages we take a five-year moving average, and so we are slower to react. When the inflation rate is dropping, as it is today, the Americans show that much more dramatically than we do. When it is going up, theirs goes up more dramatically than ours.

I would not want to say which is the best formula. We have ours; they have theirs. It is important that people compare the two rates, and when people compare the rates in Canada to those in the United States, it is important that one knows, as Dr. Courchesne told the committee, that they are talking about apples and oranges and not oranges and oranges.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, in the almost 20 years I have been in the Senate, I have never been as impressed as I was this afternoon by the speeches made by Senator Everett and Senator Roblin, which were the most remarkable exhibitions I have ever witnessed in this house.

I have always admired Senator Everett, and he gave us a picture of the estimates such as we have never had before. His speech was followed by that magnificent and impromptu speech by Senator Roblin, which was a treat to listen to. Whether we are Liberal, Tory or Independent, we must feel we have experienced something we will not soon experience again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Steuart, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I do not think such a report requires adoption. As was proposed last night, we should consider the report, but we should not adopt it. It can be considered and debated. In any event, if we are being asked to adopt the report, then it will certainly be on division.

● (1530)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Flynn is right.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: He is always right, if I may say so.

Senator Frith: I would not like to place that burden on Senator Flynn.

Senator Macquarrie: I have never known him to be wrong.

Senator Frith: For 2,000 years we have never had anyone in that category, and I am sure that Senator Flynn does not wish to be included in it now.

Honourable senators, whether Senator Flynn is always, or seldom, right, I believe he is right in this case. We have been sliding into the practice of adopting committee reports that do not need adoption. The ones that need adoption are those that report bills. This, in effect, does not report a bill, and I do not believe Senator Everett cares that his report is not adopted, because it could mean adopting viewpoints of witnesses, and so on. Therefore, we should say that it has been received, printed as an appendix to the Debates, and debated.

Senator Roblin: Fair enough.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, all that is required, I understand, is that the report of the committee on the estimates be made prior to the passing of the supply bill. There is nothing to say that it has to be adopted or dealt with before that. Senator Bosa made the suggestion that he might like to adjourn the debate and speak to it at another time. It is my understanding that there is nothing wrong with that. That does not hold up the supply bill.

Senator Flynn: In case any honourable senator would like to speak on this report, I will move the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1982-83

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill C-121, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1983.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you, Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1982-83, provides for the release of the balance of the main estimates for 1982-83. I will be brief and then try to answer any questions. It will be realized that the bill, in effect, is closely related to the main estimates, and the committee's report on them has just been debated.

There are three aspects of the estimates and supply. First, there is interim supply, which as Senator Flynn pointed out earlier, has already been granted. Secondly, there is the balance of supply and, thirdly, supplementary estimates (A) which also relate to full supply. Those are the elements.

I come now to the figures. As has been pointed out by Senator Everett, and studied by his committee, the balance that is to be released by this bill amounts to $21.884 billion, plus the whole of supplementary estimates (A) 1982-83, amounting to $114 million. The total spending authority requested by this bill is, therefore, $21.998 billion, being made up of the balance of the main estimates after interim supply that was already granted by Parliament.

Honourable senators, the main estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 23, 1982 and referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Those estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on June 15, 1982, reported on yesterday by the National Finance Committee, and debated earlier today.

Supplementary estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on June 1, 1982, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Those estimates were discussed with officials of Treasury Board on June 3, 1982 and the committee reported back on June 8. So, in effect, we had a report on supplementary estimates (A) before we received the report on the main estimates. The difference in time was approximately 12 days.

Honourable senators, I suggest that for clarification I should add to the Debates two sets of figures that are not particularly long or complicated. They are supply to date for 1982-83, and the estimates tabled to date for 1982-83. I believe they should be in reverse order. First, dealing with estimates for 1982-83 tabled to date, they show the main estimates, budgetary and the non-budgetary, the amounts that are to be voted, the amounts that are provided by statute, and the total. Dealing with the total estimates tabled, those to be voted are, budgetary, $30,345,277,948. The non-budgetary figure is $439,770,855, for a total of $30,785,048,803.

To give the figures exactly. Appropriation Act No. 1, interim supply, authorized an amount of almost $9 billion. The balance of the main estimates amounts to approximately $21.8 billion, and that plus supplementary estimates (A) of $114,096,002, gives the total referred to in the bill.

Honourable senators will see that the bill is a short one with regard to its provisions, but a long one with regard to its appendices, which contain the estimates referred to.

Honourable senators will note that it is an Address to Our Most Gracious Sovereign, asking Her Majesty to grant supply. Clause 2 of the bill grants "a sum not exceeding in the whole twenty one billion, nine hundred and ninety-eight million, six hundred and ten thousand, six hundred and seventy-three dollars and ninety-two cents", that being, as I have explained, the balance after interim supply is subtracted.

There are subclauses setting out the figures, and they can be seen on page 2 of the bill. The figures appear as I have described them. Clause 4 refers to commitments, and deals with the ability of departments to make commitments provided they are certified by the deputy minister as being within authorized amounts.

Subclause 4(2) confers authority to spend, and, of course, there is also the question of estimated revenues, because, as honourable senators will realize, in some cases revenues are anticipated. For example, if $100 is needed by a department and it estimates revenues of $20, then Parliament not only votes the $80 but it also authorizes the spending of the revenue of $20.

● (1540)

Clause 5 deals with the appropriations charged, and it is there to solve the problem of funds that have been disbursed but require adjustments for bookkeeping or what accountants would call journal entries after the period ending March 31—that is, after the end of the fiscal year.

Clause 6 deals with the provision that amounts paid or applied under the authority of the act have to be accounted for in the public accounts in accordance with section 55 of the Financial Administration Act, the main principle regarding accounts, namely, accountability to Parliament through public accounts.

Honourable senators, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration. I believe it should be considered with the report of the National Finance Committee on the estimates and also with the figures that I have attempted to supply during my comments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the sponsor of the bill if I am correct in assuming that the total budget for the main estimates is $72.9 billion and that supplementary estimates (A) is to be added to the main estimates?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the total budgetary amount is $72.9 billion, and the non-budgetary amount is $1.2 billion. Therefore, the total of the main estimates, including the budgetary and non-budgetary amounts to be voted plus the statutory amount is $74,153,177,297.

Senator Flynn: Does that include supplementary estimates (A)?

Senator Frith: No, it does not. Supplementary estimates (A) have a budgetary amount of $114,096,002. That includes the two one-dollar votes that resulted from the entry of two transfers from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Department of External Affairs. I believe we had this material before us, and honourable senators will remember that the addition of the $114.096 million was added for old unemployment insurance adjustments.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think we owe thanks to the deputy leader for his explanation of this bill. As he has mentioned, it should be considered together with the report of the National Finance Committee. I would say that that is true, particularly in light of the speech that the Minister of Finance will make next Monday.

It is very difficult, as of this moment to assess this bill without considering what will happen next Monday. At the time of the preparation of the budget of November 12, 1981, I believe the forecasted deficit was something like $10 to $11 billion. I think I read somewhere that we now have a deficit of around $16 billion, and I believe that amounts higher than that, to the extent of $18 to $20 billion, have been mentioned. Of course, those figures do not indicate any restraint on the part of the government.

Senator Everett mentioned that restraint is not the answer. I agree with him in the sense that restraint will not cure everything, but some indication of restraint on the part of the government might be helpful. The budget speech of next Monday may throw a completely different light on the entire fiscal, financial and budgetary situation of Canada. We shall have to wait and see what happens.

At this point, I do not think it would serve any useful purpose to continue the debate on the amounts contained in this bill. So, as we have agreed, we shall have second reading now, and we will agree to third reading immediately after the second reading.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that I agree with Senator Flynn that there will be a different perspective after Monday night.

Senator Flynn: We hope so, anyway.

Senator Frith: At the same time, although we have heard a good deal about what the new budget might say, we have never heard anybody suggest that it will be less than the amount shown here. Therefore, as I think the honourable senator implied, we are safe in voting this much supply, but we may be asked to vote more.

Senator Roblin: You can count on it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

GARNISHMENT, ATTACHMENT AND PENSION DIVERSION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for second reading of Bill C-38, to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to thank Senator Frith for the explanations he gave regarding Bill C-38, whose title is as follows: "An Act to provide for the garnishment or attachment of Her Majesty in right of Canada and for the diversion of pension benefits payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada under certain enactments." The bill's title is pretty dry. However, the content and purpose of this legislation were very clearly described by Senator Frith. He mentioned that in substance, this legislation was to have been presented when I was Minister of Justice. That is right. I would like to add that although the bill was not presented at that time, it does have a history. A bill was tabled in 1978, and another bill was presented in March 1979, so that the subject matter of the bill has been before Parliament for over four years.

It is therefore high time to make a decision, and in the circumstances, it would be unwise to delay the passage of this bill.

The subject is straightforward. In civil law, a debtor's goods may be seized by his creditors, with the exception of goods defined by law as non-seizable. Strangely enough, until now, non-seizable goods have included the wages and salaries of all persons receiving such monies from the Canadian government or the Crown in right of Canada. This is the only case of its kind, except, perhaps, for New Brunswick. In any case, I am told that all the other provinces have provisions for allowing the garnishment of wages and salaries of those who receive such monies from the Crown in right of a province.

I have mentioned non-seizable goods which, generally speaking, are those declared as such under provincial laws. Some have this status under federal laws and will retain it. I am referring to pensions other than those required under a payroll plan, namely, veterans' pensions, Canada Pension Plan benefits and similar plans. Non-seizable goods also include alimony payments. Under provincial laws, when an alimony-type pension is awarded, it is non-seizable by a creditor. In future, salaries of public servants and federal parliamentarians will no longer be non-seizable. Public servants and parliamentarians will have to honour their debts the same as other wage earners. That is only fair, since there has certainly been some abuse.

I remember that in the province of Quebec the same non-seizable status existed. The Code of Civil Procedure stipulated that the court could be petitioned to obtain a court order against a debtor who would have to deposit, for the benefit of his creditors, the seizable part of his salary. If the civil servant or individual receiving a salary from the Crown in right of Quebec did not obey the court order, he was guilty of contempt of court. Obviously, the person in question would have to obey the court order in the end. We have made progress since that time. Only the federal Crown still provided this exemption for salaries paid to its employees.

Those salaries will now be seizable, but only to the extent provided under provincial law. The part that is considered to be family support under provincial law will remain non-seizable, and only that part of the salary that is not considered to be family support will be deducted to pay debts. The same applies to pensions paid on the basis of salaries, that is pensions paid to public servants and parliamentarians. These pensions may be attached, but only in cases of family support orders for a spouse or children. Ordinary debts cannot be paid by attaching benefits. They may be paid by attaching salaries, but not pension benefits. Once again, these are the pensions earned normally and based on salaries. Disability, veterans and old age security pensions, as well as pensions received under the Quebec or Canada Pension Plans cannot be garnisheed because they are considered basic necessities.

We are correcting a situation which was completely unacceptable. I am aware of cases where a person refused to pay financial support by invoking privileges which should have disappeared long ago.

There are certain problems, for instance, with regard to members of the armed forces. I shall not go into the details of this question. However, the principle is the same. A decision to correct this anomaly was overdue. I have no doubt that if we had enough time to refer the bill to the committee chaired by Senator Goldenberg, several senators would be interested in learning the practical implications of the various provisions contained in this bill.

The important thing is to make a decision as soon as possible. It is interesting to note that the bill provides no exemptions. Even the salary of the Governor General and the pension benefits he receives will become subject to garnishment. The same treatment will apply to judges, senators, and members of Parliament. It will apply to everyone. The privileges once enjoyed by certain Canadians are outmoded and will be discontinued. I therefore support this bill without qualification. I am sorry that Senator Godfrey is absent. On another occasion, he said that each time we would consider a bill with which Senator Flynn had been involved in his capacity of Minister of Justice, he wanted to be here to make sure that there was no conflict of interest. I do not know what conflict of interest he could have found in this case. If there is one person who does not have any conflict of interest in this case, it is certainly the Minister of Justice, whatever party in power. This bill stands by itself, unequivocally and without restriction.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, if no one wants any explanation about some of the points made by Senator Flynn concerning important provisions of this bill and the overdue answers it provides, I would like to suggest that we proceed to third reading as soon as possible. I believe it is highly desirable to proceed as quickly as possible to obtain royal assent this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COOPERATIVE ENERGY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) moved the second reading of Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to move second reading of Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation. This bill constitutes a major departure for the co-operative movement in Canada and, indeed, for the Government of Canada, in that the co-operatives are coming together with the government in a joint venture to develop the oil and gas industry of this country.

The co-operatives are a very important element in Canada. There are more than nine million members of the co-operative movement from coast to coast, who control assets in excess of $45 billion. The co-operatives are based, in the operation of their entities, on a somewhat different principle from that on which other corporations are based. The principle of a co-operative is "One member, one vote." The profits or the savings they achieve are usually paid to their membership on the basis of patronage.

While they have not been a major factor in the development of the natural resources of this country, co-operatives are very important in the retail field, and the credit unions are extremely important in the financial field. The credit unions have a membership of millions of Canadians. The credit unions in the province of Quebec, Les Caisses Populaires Desjardins, have pioneered the credit union movement in Canada and have given leadership to the rest of Canada.

I think that this particular venture is of great importance to this country because it is a pioneering venture. It is the establishment of a new kind of company—a very broad partnership between the Government of Canada and the co-operative movement in Canada—and is designed to develop a particular part of our resource industry. In my view, this kind of venture carries with it many important advantages. To the extent that this company will go forward in the energy field, it will assist greatly in the Canadianization of that sector. The co-operatives in Canada are, as their slogan says, one hundred per cent Canadian-owned. Therefore, to the extent that this company can develop and generate profits, the necessity of dividends flowing out of the country will be somewhat reduced.

Another important feature of this bill, in my judgment, is that it is a joint venture, thereby bringing together the membership of the co-operative movement in every province of the country. It is the first time that the co-operative movement has come together in a venture of national importance. In speaking with the co-operative leaders, I have felt much of their enthusiasm towards going ahead with what is a Canadian venture and with something that will unite the co-operatives from coast to coast. I think that the support of this kind of venture is important to the national unity of this country.

The idea of co-operatives entering into the oil and gas business is not entirely new. The co-operatives established a refinery in Regina, Saskatchewan, in the early thirties. From time to time they have considered developing energy resources and a secure supply of crude oil. Over the years, however, they have been successful in supplying only about 3 per cent of the crude that goes into that refinery. Therefore, they have been anxious to obtain a secure source of supply.

The origin of Co-Enerco is more recent. As a matter of fact, it arises out of a discussion I had with Vern Leland of Federated Co-ops early in 1980. At that time I did not know, of course, that events would bring about my becoming a member of the Canadian government. After having been sworn in on March 3, 1980, I attended a cabinet meeting held at Meach Lake, at which I was able to advance some of the concepts and principles that are contained in this bill. I must say that my colleagues quickly accepted the possibilities of this type of venture and were supportive of it.

The following month I had an opportunity to make a trip to Saskatchewan. At that time I spoke again with Mr. Leland about this idea and he was enthusiastic. I might add, honourable senators, that the co-operative of which he is president, Federated Co-operatives Limited, is a western Canadian retail organization that has businesses from Thunder Bay to Vancouver Island.

I had the opportunity to meet with Mr. E. K. Turner and other officials of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, who also felt that it was a good idea. I met, as well, with Norman Bromberger, the chief executive officer of the Central Credit Union of Saskatchewan, who indicated to me that that organization would lend its support.

On May 7, 1980, a meeting was held in Ottawa with co-operative leaders. In attendance at that meeting was the Honourable Marc Lalonde, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It was my privilege to sit in on that meeting as well. I can say that Mr. Lalonde has lent support to this idea from its inception. Without the kind of leadership that he displayed, the bill, of course, would not be before us today.

Between May and October of 1980, a working group, composed of representatives of the co-operative movement and of the government, met to develop proposals concerning the appropriate means by which the co-ops could become involved.

On October 28, the National Energy Program was presented to Parliament, along with a new framework for developing the energy sector and for achieving Canadianization.

On October 30, 1980, the Prime Minister met in Regina with the co-operative leaders.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Was he a great listener then?

Senator Argue: He was a great listener and a great contributor then, and pointed out to the group that, in his college days, he had taken a motorcycle trip to Nova Scotia, where he met the late Dr. Cody and some of the other great pioneers of the co-operative movement. I want to tell honourable senators that the Prime Minister has supported from Day One the idea that has resulted in this bill.

As an aside, let me say I was pleased that, when the bill was debated in the House of Commons on Friday last, it received the unanimous support of the three parties. As a matter of fact, I believe there was an arrangement whereby one spokesman was heard from each of the parties, and the bill was subsequently passed.

By early May 1981, sufficient progress had been made to permit the co-operatives, in session at an annual meeting of the Co-operatives Union of Canada, to pass a resolution endorsing the idea of a joint venture involving the government and establishing an interim board.

By July of 1981, a draft memorandum of understanding was in an advanced state of preparation. The months that followed saw the lawyers taking over from the policy-makers to transform that draft into the various documents necessary to formalize the Canada/Cooperative Energy Investment Agreement.

● (1610)

The agreement was signed in Saskatoon on December 17, 1981, on the cooperative side by Mr. Vern Leland, the President of the Federated Cooperatives, and Mr. Ira Mumford, General Manager of the Saskatchewan Pool. He may have retired at that time, but that was the office he held over the years. On behalf of the Government of Canada the agreement was signed by the Honourable Marc Lalonde and me. Legislation has taken some time to draft and some time to put forward, but we have it before us now.

There are many provisions in this measure that are different and of a pioneering nature. The cooperatives have agreed to advance a maximum of $100 million. The federal government has agreed to provide matching funds, and to provide those funds as the cooperatives commit themselves to raising that money. The cooperatives will have the option of buying out the government equity after the corporation has been in operation for five years. Co-Enerco, as it is being called, will consist of three organizations. The Cooperative Energy Corporation, a holding company, will oversee the other two corporations—the Cooperative Exploration and Development Corporation, which will be active in oil and gas exploration and development with shares available through the exchanges; and the Cooperative Energy Investment Fund, units of which will be sold through credit unions so that individual cooperators can participate in the project.

Co-Enerco has three objectives: to provide cooperatives and their members with a means of investing in and benefiting from development of Canadian resources; to contribute to the Canadianization of the oil and gas sector while maintaining local initiative and control; and to improve the security of supply of oil and gas to cooperative organizations and their members.

Because Co-Enerco is being created by cooperative organizations and is itself a cooperative, it has taken more than two years, from the time the cooperative resources project was first proposed, to the current legislation that is now before Parliament. This is because it was necessary for co-op members from across Canada to endorse the decision to proceed. It had to be brought into their discussions, they had to consider the idea, and had to approve of it themselves if the cooperatives were to go forward with this project.

The next step, of course, after this legislation is passed, will be to get the company viable and to accumulate the capital that is necessary to go forward to meet this objective. Initially, Co-Enerco is expected to concentrate exclusively on the oil and gas industries. Oil and gas exploration and development are expected to be, initially, heaviest in the conventional oil and gas regions of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Co-Enerco will also be open to consideration of involvement in the frontier areas of the east coast, of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Labrador, the Beaufort Sea and the Canadian Arctic. As the company becomes more firmly established, it is possible that it will become involved in other ventures, if they appear to prove profitable, such as the development of the tar sands and heavy oil regions of western Canada. Co-Enerco is also structured in such a way that it can become involved in such energy related fields as solar energy, coal and so forth, although there are no plans for early involvement in this area.

Once this company is established it will consider whether or not it wishes to acquire existing energy companies, or whether it wishes to go forward with joint ventures with existing energy companies. Of course, it would have the other option of going forward on its own. I know that a lot of consideration has already been given to the kind of action that should be taken, and the kind of investments that should be made once the company is in full operation.

The Canadian government's commitment is, basically, a long term commitment, but the government's investment can be bought out by the cooperatives any time after five years. This company is basically a cooperative venture. The government's role is one of support and encouragement. The government has shown that it does not in any way wish to control this company, and it demonstrates that attitude by agreeing to a provision whereby the cooperatives will appoint nine members to a board of directors, while the Government of Canada will appoint three members to the board of directors. The Canadian government's contribution is, as I said, to be supportive and helpful, to provide certain sums of money, and, hopefully, the representatives of the government, along with their colleagues from the cooperative side, will be able to bring expert advice to the company that will help ensure its success.

The cooperatives have been successful to date in getting financial commitments to go ahead from a very substantial number of their organizations, and I want to read into the record the list of those cooperatives that have already agreed to commit funds to this company, together with the amount of those funds. The list of cooperatives, together with the amounts they have committed, I think, indicates the extent of the support for this company.

The companies and their commitments are as follows: The Alberta Wheat Pool, $8 million; the B.C. Central Credit Union, $500,000; the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society Limited, $1 million; Co-op Atlantic Co-op Atlantique, $1 million; Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, $5 million; Co-operative Fire and Casualty Company, $1,750,000; Co-operators Insurance Association, $2.5 million; Co-operators Life Insurance Company, $750,000; Credit Union Federation of Alberta Limited, $500,000; Federated Co-operatives Limited, $20 million—and their contribution is large because they own the co-operative refinery and they are already, to that extent, in the oil business; la Fédération des Caisses Populaires Acadieuses Limitée, $250,000; Manitoba Pool Elevators, $2.5 million; Newfoundland and Labrador Credit Union Limited, $30,000; Nova Scotia Credit Union League, $40,000; Saskatchewan Co-operative Credit Society Limited, $1 million; Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, $12 million; United Co-operatives of Ontario, $100,000; Cumis Life Insurance Company, which is a cooperative life insurance company, $200,000; Cumis General Insurance Company, $50,000; the credit unions in British Columbia, through their central, $609,000; and Prince Edward Island Credit Union League Limited, $25,000. The grand total is $57,804,000.

I think that is a very commendable commitment by the cooperative movement of this country to this particular company. The federal government is putting up a matching amount at this time, and as the co-operatives obtain further commitments the government will match those amounts up to $100 million.

• (1620)

Senator Asselin: Why don't they take the money?

Senator Argue: In setting up this company, leadership has come from many people in the co-operative movement. I want to acknowledge that kind of leadership from Mr. George May of the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society; Mr. Bill Bergen, formerly chief executive officer of Federated Co-operatives; Mr. Joe Dierker, legal adviser to the co-operative movement; Mr. Bruce Thordarson, Executive Director, and Mr. Jim Milne, Assistant Director, Co-operative Union of Canada; Mr.

Jonathan Guss, Vice-President, Government Affairs, Canadian Co-operative Credit Society; and Mr. David Martin, chief executive officer, Co-Enerco, formerly a vice-president of exploration and development with a major oil company in Canada.

I am certain, honourable senators, that this kind of new venture designed to assist Canada in developing our energy resources, based on the principle of Canadian ownership and centred among nine million members of the co-operative movement, is something that will commend itself to the Senate and receive the full support of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill C-120, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-120 was passed by the House of Commons on June 18, 1982, and proposed the so-called pro-rating amendment to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. That act provides for the January adjustment to all public service pensions to compensate for increases in the cost of living over the preceding year.

Under its current provisions, the full annual increase is payable each January to all pensioners, even those who retired during the preceding year. This means that there is a tendency for employees considering retirement to do so at the year's end in order to benefit from both a full year's salary and a full year's post-retirement adjustment. It is proposed that this anomaly of double adjustment for the last year of work be eliminated by providing that the first post-retirement benefit be pro-rated on the basis of the time which has elapsed between the date of retirement and the end of the year. This means that the first supplementary benefit will be directly related to the actual retirement time.

Under the arrangement now proposed, a person who retired in January of a given year would receive eleven-twelfths of the full year's adjustment paid the following January. One who retired in June would receive, the following January, six-twelfths of the full benefit, and one who retired in December would receive nothing by way of an adjustment the next month, but would receive a full adjustment in January of the second calendar year following retirement.

The government has been attempting for some time to get this proposal into place. There are several reasons for proceeding now. As well as the cost savings effected by the proposal, and its personnel management implications, the matter should be settled once and for all to make it easier for public servants to make their retirement planning decisions.

Adoption of this amendment would mean cost savings that would grow year by year. There would be a cost saving of some $6 million in 1983 alone, and because the savings are both additive and compounded, they would escalate rapidly in subsequent years. For example, in the fiscal year 1984-85, the savings will have escalated to $14.8 million.

As far as personnel management is concerned, adoption of the proposal should bring about a more even distribution of retirements throughout the year, which would facilitate replacement programs. Under the current law, retirements tend to bunch at the year end. Last year, for example, some 56 per cent of retirements took place during the last quarter. Moreover, with the uncertainty that has existed over the past few years, people have been leaving their decisions until the very last moment. It has not been unusual in the past four years or so for departments to have to cope with large numbers of two-week notices of retirement from long-service employees.

The final point I wish to mention with respect to this bill is its effective date. The original intention was to have pro-rating apply to anyone who retired at any time during the year in which the amendment was approved. However, there were representations that this timing would change the rules of the game for those who retired before the change was actually enacted. Accordingly, an amendment was adopted during consideration of the bill in the House of Commons, which amendment provides that there will not be any pro-rating of the first year's indexing payment for those who retire before the bill receives royal assent.

In the other place last Friday, by agreement of all parties, this bill was given approval at all stages at one sitting. Unless specifically requested to do so, I do not believe there is any need for me to recommend that this bill be referred to committee for detailed consideration. Therefore, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have little to say about this particular piece of legislation. As Senator McElman has pointed out, it is a fairly simple bill, and one which has been necessary for a long time now.

I would have liked to have seen a more comprehensive bill dealing with the pension situation in Canada. Attention to that area has long been deferred, and it really cannot await attention much longer. The areas that have to be looked at in terms of pensions are well known to honourable senators and, indeed, to all Canadians.

The reports that have been made on the subject are numerous and well documented. The attention they have received has been sporadic and, therefore, they have faded into the woodwork. We have been promised a green paper, a conference and so forth. There was to be a conference following the conference in late 1981. There was to be a meeting with the representatives of the provinces to look further into the pension situation in Canada as it related to provincial economies and needs. That has not happened and it now appears that the green paper we were promised will not be forthcoming. Perhaps we can look forward to seeing that next year.

The degree to which the Government of Canada and, indeed, the provinces and the private sector are involved in pension commitments and obligations must be staggering, and it should be looked at more carefully and brought to the attention of the public.

Having said those few words, I shall now revert to the bill under consideration. First, I should like to say that I see no reason why it should be held up. It is a routine piece of legislation and there is no reason to delay it.

● (1630)

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator McElman speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I simply wish to thank Senator Doody for his comments on the bill and to say that I have no problem with his further remarks concerning pensions, because in general terms I agree with everything he has said.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

Hon. Charles McElman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved that Bill C-118, to amend certain acts that provide for the retention of records, be read a second time.

He said: Honourable senators, the legislation now before us would amend the time limits provided for the retention of records. The bill will enable Canadian businesses to save part of the costs of maintaining certain records as required under federal acts. The problem is this. It is estimated that these businesses are keeping a total 170 million cubic feet of files, the storage of which costs $500 million a year. Indeed, such a heap of papers could fill a train load of 44,000 freight cars that could extend from Toronto to Montreal.

No doubt, some records must be kept. This legislation however would allow doing away with records that various federal departments are now considering as surplus, or the retention time limits of which seem unnecessarily long. Current requirements are no longer in line with the new federal policy on special and maximum time limits. In addition to changes brought about by this measure, departments were requested to support regulations under 50 other acts, in order to keep abreast of the new time limits for the retention of records.

Both Canadian businesses and federal organizations will therefore know exactly what is to be kept and for how long. These initiatives will help eliminate some $100 million of unnecessary expenditures each year, the saving being passed on to the consumers.

The purpose of this legislation is in line with efforts made by the government to lighten the burden imposed on the Canadian economy by regulations. The legislation is also in line with the government's intention to improve public administration by updating the regulatory and relevant process.

While this bill was being drafted, consultations were held with business representatives, including those of the Financial Executives Institute, the Association of Record Managers and Administrators and the Canadian Manufacturers Association. These groups were so enthusiastic about the standardization of record retention requirements that, taking the lead from the Government of Canada, they undertook to convince provinces to amend their respective legislation accordingly. In fact, representatives of the Financial Executives Institute met with MLA's in each province in an attempt to obtain that provincial retention requirements be brought in line with federal standards.

Pursuant to the goal of lightening the paper burden that bears heavily on the Canadian economy and, second, to improve public administration by reviewing the regulation process, other activities are underway in the context of the regulation reform itself.

For instance, a wide spectrum of unnecessary acts and regulations had to be reviewed and departmental policies and regulatory programs assessed. In addition, the government is reviewing the regulation process in order to improve regulations notice, representation and impact analysis procedures.

As far as the review of existing acts and regulations is concerned, a blanket repeal legislation was recently introduced to repeal some 124 obsolete acts. In addition to the above-mentioned review, others are aimed at removing useless, inconsistent or redundant rules, especially in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Communications, the Department of Transport, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and the Department of Labour.

Under direction 490, the Administrative Policy Branch requires that all new regulations dealing with health, security and equity be subjected to a thorough analysis of their social and economic impact. On the basis of that principle, the Office of the Co-ordinator of Regulatory Reform is reviewing the means to improve the assessment system before other federal regulations are implemented in other areas. The conclusions of that review with recommendations dealing with the possibility of amending the system will be delivered to the cabinet to enable the ministers to consider them subsequently. As for improving the federal regulatory process, the government is considering draft regulatory bills. Such drafts would be published twice a year. They would be used as notices for all proposed regulatory provisions. Their preliminary publication will enable the private sector to apply in due time to the department involved to get acquainted with the proposed regulation.

To carry out the recommendations of the Parliamentary Task Force on Regulatory Reform, we have undertaken to improve comprehensive consultation mechanisms in the regulatory area. The consultation process between the public and private sectors should remain flexible to meet the needs of departments while allowing the consideration of a special aspect of regulation at a given time.

As far as draft regulatory bills, such as the one on the broadening of consultation procedures with each department, are concerned, I am convinced that the quality of new rules will be enhanced if the individuals subject to the regulation take part from the beginning in the drafting of those rules. The Privy Council Office has looked into the cases of crown corporations with a special emphasis on the main regulatory bodies. This study was based—and I mean to insist on this in this house—on the recommendations which appeared particularly in the fourth report of the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and in the report of the parliamentary task force on regulatory reform—

Hon. Martial Asselin: For once!

Senator Langlois: One of the purposes of the study by the Privy Council Office was to ensure that the regulatory processes of the agencies are more efficient, in order to ease the administrative burden which Canadians must bear.

The government is currently looking into the Economic Council of Canada's final report entitled Reforming Regulations, 1981, in order to amend all regulations of an economic nature which apply to industries and activities under federal jurisdiction.

Besides looking into proposed regulations of an economic nature and without disregarding the government's wish to ease the administrative burden to be borne by Canadians in general, other proposed regulations were considered. This step was prompted by the excellent contribution made by the Senate and House of Commons Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments and by the Peterson committee report which was tabled in the House in December 1980. All these studies are still very useful to the government in selecting activities to be part of its regulatory reform.

As I mentioned earlier, the proposed amending bill which I have just referred to is a concrete proposal, a series of federal standards which inform Canadian firms just what documents they are supposed to keep and for how long.

These new documents will increase the effectiveness of the people involved in the management of documents and will result in substantial savings for many corporations. In the long run, consumers will benefit. Moreover, the federal government will show the way, in the hope that the provinces will follow.

In conclusion, I must say that pursuant to clause 8 of the bill before us, this legislation, once passed by this house, will come into force 90 days after receiving royal assent.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. Congratulations are in order both to the government and to Senator Langlois for an excellent presentation especially with respect to the need for this kind of bill. In these difficult economic times, while it is not a large measure for business but certainly a significant one, I think honourable senators on this side of the house would agree that this is interesting and helpful legislation to business, especially small business across the country. Therefore, I see no reason why the bill should not go forward at this time.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I merely want to add a word to remind this house that this motion was unanimously adopted in the other place on June 18 last.

Senator Asselin: It does not mean anything.

Motion agreed to and bill read for the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When will this bill be read for the third time?

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of this house, I move that the bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read for the third time and passed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stollery, seconded by the Honourable Senator Anderson, for the second reading of the Bill C-108, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3)".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, unfortunately Senator Marshall is unavoidably absent for a week. He requested that I speak on this motion in order to expedite the passage of the bill, and, with leave, I am prepared to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, unfortunately my remarks will not be as interesting or as informative as those of Senator Marshall or, indeed, the sponsor of the bill, Senator Stollery.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We'll decide that.

Senator Phillips: You are being very kind. I have noticed in the past that when Senator Frith is being kind it is time to watch your back.

Throughout the explanation, emphasis was placed on the fact that electrical transmission lines have now become lengthy and serve much the same purpose as many of the pipelines and, therefore, should come under the same regulations.

Clauses 12 to 30 give more power to the National Energy Board with respect to both interprovincial and international pipelines. Many of the amendments are necessary as a result of a change in transmission patterns. However, I suspect that many of them are also being made with a desire to put greater control in the hands of the Governor in Council.

The minister, in the other place, spent considerable time explaining that the amendments were not designed to affect the present agreement or, perhaps I should say disagreement, between Quebec and Newfoundland concerning the Churchill Falls. It is not my desire to tread where angels fear to tread, except to say I consider it unfortunate that the two provinces have not been able to resolve their differences and to find a more efficient way of settling their dispute than taking it to the courts. Both provinces, like the rest of Canada, have high unemployment rates and both could benefit from a settlement. The Province of Newfoundland states it lost $500 million in the last 10 years.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is urging both provinces to settle their differences and has stated that the federal government has made no effort to mediate the dispute. I realize that this will be a most difficult dispute to mediate. The federal government would possibly be damned in both provinces. However, I ask honourable senators if it is necessary that the federal government do the mediating because it would certainly be much better if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources kept out of the situation. Surely, he could find a retired judge, a former premier, a law professor or, possibly, even a former senator who could attempt to mediate and make a recommendation to both provinces. The recommendation would naturally not be binding, but I would hope that it would be helpful.

• (1650)

Clause 30 will permit the Governor in Council to designate an interprovincial power line as an international line. This will permit the board to hold public hearings, cancel authority for construction and set specific conditions for continuation of the certificate. Extensive powers are granted to the federal government under this clause. The minister assures us that the government will not act alone. Surely, no one would suspect that the federal government would act unilaterally.

Hon. C. William Doody: Never.

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Phillips: Least of all, the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec. I wonder why the minister kept emphasizing that the federal government would consult with the provinces before acting.

The first amendment contained in the bill causes me some concern. Clause 1(1)(b)(ii)(B) reads:

to a place outside Canada from any area of land not within a province that belongs to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that is situated in those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is greater, or

This particular subclause causes me concern in that the description, while it mentions oil, also refers to natural resources. Could it not be interpreted to mean any mineral as being a natural resource? As a Prince Edward Islander, I think of the lobsters in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, off our coast, as being a natural resource, and I would hate to think that that resource would come under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. I hope that the committee studying this matter will have a look at that aspect of the bill.

I also believe that this clause takes too much authority away from the right of the provinces to have some say in the control of resources off their coast. There is a dispute between the federal government and the Province of Newfoundland concerning oil fields such as Hibernia, but I would point out that this clause covers not only that field. The west coast would come under this clause, as would the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which may be affected by the extension into James Bay and Hudson Bay. I wonder whether anyone has had a look at the possible effect of that clause in those two provinces. I have been unable to find any reference to this matter in the reports of the committee of the other place studying it.

The United Nations has in the past discussed the ownership of resources at the bottom of the sea. Canada has made certain commitments at the United Nations. Are we, intentionally or unintentionally, breaking those commitments by claiming ownership of the resources for 200 miles out to sea from what we call our baseline?

Clause 26(2) will allow those members of the National Energy Board who contributed to our National Energy Program—which I noticed this afternoon is not as popular in this chamber as it was in the past—to control the price on the exports of gas and oil. Honourable senators will recall that in the not-too-distant past the western provinces objected to a budget measure which provided an export tax on natural gas to the United States. At the present time Canada has only one export market for natural gas, and that is the United States.

The Government of the United States, as opposed to the pattern followed by the Canadian government, has deregulated the export and sale of gas in that country. As a result, the gas prices there have dropped. In addition, consider all the oil rigs that left Canada as a result of the National Energy Program and moved to the United States where, particularly in the western states, they have found considerable amounts of natural gas. As a result, their need for our gas is not nearly as great as it once was.

I wonder why we are giving this body complete authority to set the price and the amount of gas that can be exported without any reference back to Parliament. Once this bill is passed, it is on the books for all time, unless the act is subsequently amended. I think that is a mistake and that we should have a very careful look at that aspect of the bill.

The bill also allows the Governor in Council to allocate the supply of gas and oil. This may be necessary in war time or in times of emergency, but the section does not stipulate that an emergency must exist. Section 87.1 (1) reads:

The Governor in Council may by order direct that the Board assume supervision and control of the movement of oil or gas, or both, or any quality or kind thereof (hereinafter in this Part called "designated oil or gas") out of a province or the offshore area or both—

This gives the Governor in Council complete control. They can designate where certain gas will flow. I am particularly concerned about the reference to the effect that the National Energy Board can control the movement out of an offshore area. That wording gives the Cabinet the authority to say where oil from Hibernia will be refined, and to say whether gas from Sable Island or south of Nova Scotia will be allowed to flow westward or only into the Nova Scotia market.

I think this bill leaves too much control in the hands of the Cabinet. The excuse given by the government is that it is a political matter. Certainly, it is a political matter, and that is all the more reason why it should come back to Parliament for approval. Here there is no need for that authority.

Honourable senators, I ask you to give these brief points very careful consideration before you proceed further with Bill C-108.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATION TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 16, debate on the motion of Senator Croll:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggressions must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it is rather late so I will try to be brief. I simply want to make a few remarks, not because I am against this motion but because I wanted to obtain some information. When Senator Croll introduced the motion in the Senate, he did not give us notice. He simply stated: This motion has been unanimously adopted in the other place. That was the main reason he gave us so that the Senate would adopt the motion. I would have preferred that such a contentious motion be introduced after proper notice so that the members of this House would have had an opportunity to study it before endorsing it and agreeing to adopt it.

The motion of Senator Croll in itself, even though it was unanimously adopted in the other place, is not sufficient reason for the Senate to act the same way and adopt it without debating its validity. That argument is unsound. Quite experienced as we know him to be, Senator Croll raised that argument because he wanted to make the Senate believe that it was not a contentious motion.

Personally, I think that the motion is premature and useless. I am not against the wording of the motion. Here is how it reads:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

The war may be over, but the conflict is not. That is the difference.

Hon. Peter Bosa: The battle is over.

Senator Asselin: Perhaps the armed battle is over.

Senator Bosa: I agree.

Senator Asselin: That is why my first argument is the following: the motion is premature. There is so much doubt as to whether the conflict is over that the day after the arms were laid down at Port Stanley the British Prime Minister sent a message to the Argentine government asking them to confirm that Argentina, just as Great Britain, did consider that all hostilities in the South Atlantic had ended. And she added: "It is important that that be established clearly and without delay". According to one of Mrs. Thatcher's officials, Great Britain wanted to make sure that the end of the fighting would be accompanied by a suspension of hostilities on the part of the Argentine army stationed on the mainland 150 kilometers away from the Falkland Islands. Mrs. Thatcher, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, as happens in every conflict and every war, was hoping to get from the Government of Argentina a declaration, an agreement to the effect that the conflict was actually over.

Subsequently, the President of Argentina made a statement on television but failed to admit, however, that the conflict was indeed over. Even after he was deposed, the military junta refused to recognize that the conflict had come to an end. The Argentineans never admitted defeat.

Great Britain's attitude is surprising. It was reported that last Sunday the British Air Force had taken over the Sandwich Islands. They occupied the islands when everyone thought that the conflict was over.

I think it is still too early to adopt a motion congratulating Great Britain for having implemented the United Nations resolution the way it did, that is by going to war. Hostilities have not come to an end yet because Argentina has not agreed to the ending of the conflict. She has not yet agreed to sign a formal agreement to that effect.

My second point is that this motion that could be voted and passed by the Senate in my mind is pointless. We are dealing with two allied countries. Everyone should understand that. Our government has been saying over and over again that we have reached maturity a long time ago, in other words that we are a sovereign nation. This is what we have been told when the Constitution was brought home. We must not forget that Argentina is a friend of ours. Thus, our adopting this motion, honourable senators, somehow would further humiliate a country that is playing a quite significant role on the American continent. We have trade relations with Argentina. The fact is that we sold them a Candu reactor. We have Canadians working in that country. Even if we decided to impose economic sanctions on Argentina at the beginning of the hostilities, I am under the impression that we were wise enough diplomatically speaking not to prejudice our relations with that country. Now, if we pass this resolution, we will surely add to Argentina's humiliation by the very fact that we say Argentina lost the war. She must be grieving for the soldiers who gave up their lives in battle, as well as those who were wounded during the conflict. I have a feeling that we stand to lose in our role with regard to the Organization of American States if we adopt it.

Let us remember that the United States, by supporting Great Britain during the conflict, were, after a fashion, the scapegoats of the Argentines. It has been said in Argentina that if the war turned out as it did the United States are to blame. Why should we also play that role when Canada is bound to be called upon in the future to play an important and prestigious role in its relations with South American countries?

I feel that by adopting this motion today in the Senate, we will decrease our chances of assuming that important role within the Organization of American States. Though we may not now be members of the organization, we have the status of observers and our advice is sought by the countries of South America. We saw the role Canada played in El Salvador. We also had some influence in Nicaragua and the Argentines did appreciate us a lot at one time. Why pass a motion that will add to the humiliation of a friendly country?

Consequently, I cannot see that we stand to gain anything internationally by adopting this motion as it reads now. Perhaps we should wait. We are told that Canada intends to lift its economic sanctions against Argentina. The countries of the European Community have already done so.

Personally, I feel the motion can wait. There are more pressing matters to be attended to by the Senate. If Senator Croll were willing to reconsider the motion he introduced, perhaps he could delay its presentation until a more propitious time, when it can better serve both parties concerned.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to move the adjournment of the debate, I will do so. I have been most impressed by the address of our distinguished colleague, Senator Asselin, who is one of the leading internationalists here. I should like to reflect upon the many thoughtful utterances he has made and, therefore, I move that this debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

FELICITATIONS TO FRENCH CANADIANS—ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF JOHN CABOT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, tomorrow, June 24, is Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, and because the Senate will not be sitting I should like to extend congratulations to all my French Canadian colleagues in the Senate and all my French Canadian compatriots in Canada.

I understand that Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day originated in the early days of settlement by French Canadians in this country. On June 24 they were celebrating the beginning of summer. In 1834 Monsieur Duvernay founded the Saint-Jean-Baptiste Society. Then, in 1908, Pope Pius X proclaimed St. Jean-Baptiste the patron saint of French Canadians.

That is the history behind this important date. It is an historic date and one that should be celebrated by all Canadians.

June 24, 1982, also marks another historic event. It is the 485th anniversary of the arrival of John Cabot—Giovanni Caboto—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa: I wanted to show that I am altruistic at this particular moment. This date marks the arrival of Giovanni Caboto on the shores of Canada, when he took possession of this land in the name of King Henry VII. We should not forget this important event, and all of Canada should celebrate these two historic occasions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I am pleased that Senator Bosa has brought to our attention the fact that tomorrow is a signal day in the history of Canada and, in particular, the history of the province of Newfoundland. In all honesty, as a historian, I am compelled to say there is no direct and irrefutable evidence as to what land John Cabot first touched, having sailed from Bristol across the Atlantic Ocean. Certainly, the tradition is very strong that his first landfall was what is now called Cape Bonavista. Some people think "Bonavista" is Italian—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, never.

Senator Rowe: —and some people think it is Portuguese, but it means "happy sight" or "happy view." It is believed that of all the North American land that Cabot might have explored, he sighted Cape Bonavista first. That belief is reinforced by the fact that the capital city of Newfoundland is St. John's, and that name goes back to the time of Cabot. There is no complete evidence, but the tradition is that, after sighting Cape Bonavista, Cabot proceeded south, and on June 24 sailed into one of the historic harbours of North America, the harbour which now bears the name St. John's.

I should like to pay tribute again to that outstanding Italian explorer, a native of Genoa, who was possibly a classmate of Christopher Columbus, who later in life became a citizen of Venice and, still later, one of the great names in early Canadian and North American history.

Senator Flynn: St. Jean-Baptiste is the patron saint of French Canadians from sea to sea, and the feast of St. Jean-Baptiste has become, as I believe Senator Bosa mentioned, a national holiday in Quebec. It is interesting to note that Quebecers and Newfoundlanders celebrate provincial holidays on the same day. It is especially interesting when one bears in mind the current dialogue between the two premiers. But let us all set our differences aside tomorrow and rejoice together.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Monday next, June 28, 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

NATIONAL TRAINING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, June 28, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz be added to the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POLAND—MOTION FOR REMOVAL OF MARTIAL LAW ADOPTED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, yesterday I had the privilege of saying a few words about the visit to Ottawa of the President of the Canadian Polish Congress who submitted a petition signed by 40,000 Canadians asking the Canadian government to urge the Polish government to remove martial law in Poland.

Therefore, I move:

That in the spirit of the Helsinki Final Act, the Senate urge the Polish Government to remove martial law, release from detention Lech Walesa and other members of Solidarity, and commence negotiations with the Church and Solidarity to solve the political and economic problems plaguing Poland.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not enjoy again having to raise a point or order with respect to this motion, because I have nothing against the motion itself. However, to clear the record, yesterday leave was asked—

Hon. Martial Asselin: We did not grant leave yesterday; we refused leave.

Senator Frith: That is what I was just about to say. We did not grant leave to move the motion yesterday, and we treated the matter as if it were a Notice of Motion. Therefore, it appears on today's Order Paper under "Motions".

If we are to do this in an orderly way we will not deal with this motion until we reach the end of the Order Paper, and His Honour the Speaker calls "Motions". However, the Senate can give Senator Haidasz leave to move his motion immediately, if it so wishes.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Leave is granted if no speech is made.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 28, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

[English]

Honourable senators, in speaking to the motion, I point out that it is expected that the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech at 8 o'clock on Monday evening.

I have discussed various ways honourable senators may be able to hear that speech, in spite of the fact that we are to sit on Monday evening because we have legislation to deal with.

Senator Perrault, Senator Flynn and I have come to the conclusion that we should assemble, as usual, at 8 o'clock, or perhaps a few minutes before that time, and that we should adjourn during pleasure—and I am sure it will be a pleasure—to resume at the call of the bell and thus accommodate honourable senators wishing to listen to the speech. That is one solution. An alternative is to adjourn until 9 o'clock. I think it better to adjourn until 8 o'clock on Monday evening, with the assurance that honourable senators will be given an opportunity to hear the speech, either by attendance in the gallery of the other place or by means of television.

● (1415)

For that reason, honourable senators, I am moving that we adjourn until next Monday evening at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is one other advantage to this plan of either listening to the speech in the other place or seeing and hearing it delivered on television. I expect that we will enjoy the presence in the chamber of Senator Olson, the great theoretician of the last budget, so that after the speech is delivered by the Minister of Finance we will be able to put questions to him. That will be a useful—if not useful, at least entertaining—exercise.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to point out that if honourable senators watch the television, they will not hear much of the speech given by the Minister of Finance. They will hear from the reporters on CBC and CTV; they will hear interviews in pubs; and they will hear the views of coal miners in Sydney, Nova Scotia. Although honourable senators will hear the reporters scooping the Minister of Finance, and telling us what he is going to say because they have been briefed beforehand, I doubt whether they will hear much directly from the minister.

Senator Flynn: If we did not have Senator Godfrey, honourable senators, I wonder what we would do in this place. At any rate, I am quite sure that it will be easier to understand what is going on from watching television than it will be from listening to the minister directly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COOPERATIVE ENERGY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Argue for the second reading of Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to continue the debate which was commenced yesterday by my honourable friend, Senator Argue, who introduced a very interesting piece of legislation in this house. It is Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation.

I am not entirely sure of my history, but I think that this is probably an innovation—something new in terms of the energy industry that we have certainly not seen in this country before—and I conclude that it is a worthwhile innovation. It has some interesting features, I suggest.

The energy field is one which, up until recently, and even now in large measure, has been a closed book to the small man, if I can use that expression without sounding in any way condescending. The ordinary citizen of the country sometimes has not been encouraged, as he might have been, to enter into the highly risky occupation of investing in oil and energy discovery projects. It has been a problem how to encourage ordinary Canadians to take part in an entrepreneurial activity like looking for oil.

I think that this bill offers, to many Canadians, such an opportunity. It extends the participation of Canadians in a highly risky enterprise—looking for oil—yet one which we all deem to be essential to the future in terms of our national interest.

● (1420)

Working in this way, through the co-operative movement generally, not only provides an opportunity for members of those organizations to take part in this risky undertaking, but also a method of mobilizing capital. One of the great features of the co-operative movement is that it provides a way for small people to get together, mobilize their capital, and join their separate interests into one larger whole. As far as I know, opening up the oil industry to this kind of co-operative mobilization is certainly something new.

The advantages that will be provided by this measure are, I think, considerable. It will mobilize capital in a unique and different way, and permit the ordinary citizen who is associated with the co-operative movement to take part in risk-taking, which, of course, we are anxious to promote: we want Canadians to get into this industry as deeply as they can. The principle of the bill certainly appeals to me. I like the sound of it, and I hope it will be a successful development.

Some of the details, I think, could stand a little explanation, and I have no doubt that that will be forthcoming in committee. I am interested, for example, in the financing arrangements, which are not clear on a reading of the bill.

From this point of view the bill is rather complicated. There will be four different classes of shares—A, B, C and D—and I am sure there is a reason for them. There are certain conditions attached to A shares that are different from those attached to B shares, and so on. We have something called an equity debenture. If I stretch my imagination I can visualize what that is, but I would like to know a little more about the equity debenture, which, if I read the bill correctly, is to be held by the Government of Canada. The whole mechanism seems to be rather elaborate. As it has been enshrined in this bill, it is something of a mystery to me, and I would like to have a little more explanation as to how the machine will work.

There are some interesting factors connected with the control of the operation. I, for one, was pleased to hear the minister say that control will remain in the hands of the private sector, so to speak, or the co-operative sector, as a result of the nine-to-three split in the directors as between the co-operative sector and the government, but I wonder what will become of the voting shares. That point was not clarified when this bill was presented to us. Do the voting shares fall into any particular ratio? What voting share power, if any, does the Government of Canada exercise in this operation?

I would also like the minister, when he winds up the debate—or perhaps this is a matter to be left to the committee—to explain, more clearly than I have been able to decipher, the constraint principle that we find in clauses 15 and 16. There are two different kinds of constraints which may be applied to the shares of this company. While they will all be in full operation before anyone subscribes for any shares—as I read the bill—and therefore there is no retroactivity, or anything of that sort, I would like to know whether they are on all fours with the principle of constraint enshrined in the energy bills that are before us. I would like to examine the relationship between the constraint principle established by this bill, and that contained in the other bills that I have referred to.

The final feature I would refer to is the contribution of the federal government to this operation. They are putting up half of the cash, up to a total of $100 million. No one will object if the co-operative movement wants to put in more money, but the bill provides for equal contributions from the government and the co-operative movement up to the limit of $100 million apiece. The $100 million that the government puts in is public money, and some consideration has to be given to that. In thinking about it, I compared it to the petroleum incentive payment grants that are being provided in the Canada lands, and which amount to a much higher proportion of the cost in those operations than is the case in this bill. The grants in the PIP system go up to 80 per cent in the Canada lands, so I do not think we are breaking much new ground in providing a federal grant to the co-operatives to look for oil in the Canadian oil-bearing lands on a 50:50 basis, particularly as we have heard their first target is going to be the conventional oil lands in the provincial areas as opposed to the Canada lands. Therefore, I do not have much trouble with that.

I would be interested to know, however, what the terms of repayment are. I understand there is a "buy-out" provision, whereby the co-operatives can refund the government its money and become the full owner of this operation. Under what terms is this to be done and, in the meantime, what return, if any, does the Government of Canada expect on its capital investment. I notice that one type of share seems to be a payment in lieu of interest, a share that would discharge an interest obligation. Perhaps that is the connection, but I would appreciate it if the minister would clear up that matter.

● (1425)

There is one point, however, that I am not completely satisfied with, and that is the question of accountability to Parliament. No matter how one looks at it, the government is putting up half the money, $100 million, out of public funds and, therefore, that is of interest to Parliament. Undoubtedly, the question of accountability to Parliament has to be considered.

I noticed that the bill makes it perfectly clear that these corporations are not crown agencies. Therefore, there is no question of their being covered by any of the present rules and regulations we have for the accountability of crown corporations to Parliament. In spite of that fact, 50 per cent of the corporations are to be financed by the government.

I see that if any amendment is to be made in the agreement between the government and the co-operative movement it must be validated later by Parliament. It seems to me that we should consider whether it would be useful to have some provision in the bill that, while the money is outstanding, would allow for some sort of report to the people who provide the money. The minister may say to me, "We have directors on the board, what more do you want?" That is true, but I think it would be wise to consider some definite understanding to the effect that the directors would report to Parliament on how the government's money is being managed. After all, we do have an abiding and continuing interest in the matter. I would like to see that point addressed.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say about this bill. It looks to me like a people's enterprise, a people's "entrepreneurship", if I can use such a word. I think it is a useful initiative and I wish the participants well. I am prepared to support the bill.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before Senator Argue speaks, I would like to ask him this question: Will the co-operatives receive the same assurance of government assistance as Dome Petroleum has received?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Argue speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not intend to get into any comparisons with the co-operatives' position in this bill or any speculative position on Dome's relationship with the government. I can say, though, that I am very pleased to hear the comments of Senator Roblin, and I am sure that the co-operative movement will be very appreciative of his generous and enthusiastic support of the principles behind this legislation. It is a measure that opens up investment in an innovative way for ordinary Canadians. It is a measure which will assist the co-operatives on mobilizing capital across the country.

When new issues of shares are going on the market, I think it is a fairly normal practice that for a time certain insiders, let us say, have access to them. So the co-operative membership, all nine million members, for a short period of time will have an opportunity to purchase a new equity issue. When they have made their purchases, those shares will go on the capital markets of this country in the ordinary way through investment dealers. So, it is an instrument to gather together capital from all parts of the country. It is private enterprise; it is individual initiative.

I am not sure that I can answer the rather technical questions advanced by Senator Roblin concerning what he described as a rather technical bill. The control by way of directors will be three-to-one in favour of the co-operatives, so there is no endeavour by the government to control the operation of the corporations. Again, I am not an expert, but I believe that the measure of control is set out by saying that the co-operatives' share will be equal to three votes.

● (1430)

As I understand it, the government is putting up $100 million. There is no interest charge for that money. It is also my understanding that the government, by having put up that sum of money, will have an equity investment in the corporation. The technical people will be able to correct me, if necessary, but I understand that the government may gain if the co-operatives decide to buy out that equity investment. If the equity investment is then worth more than $100 million, the government will have the gain of whatever that investment is above $100 million.

I had hoped that it would not be necessary to have this measure go to committee, but I understand that Senator Roblin wishes it to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where those questions can be dealt with.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a further question for the minister. I presume that at some time there will be a profit made on this venture. Will the members of this co-operative pay income tax and other taxes on the same basis as the other members of the oil community or the oil companies?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, that is a question on which I should not venture an opinion. The taxation affecting earnings by co-operatives is somewhat different, because of the practice they follow, from that of other corporations. If my memory serves me correctly, for co-operatives there is a withholding tax paid for a given amount of profit that may be declared, and the dividend payments are taxable only in the hands of the taxpayer on receipt.

I would rather not get into the question of whether or not this company will be subject to what my honourable friend describes as corporation taxes affecting all corporations. That is the sort of question that might be asked in committee.

Senator Phillips: I appreciate the answer given by the minister, but I ask him to be more explicit. For instance, my brother, who lives on Prince Edward Island, belongs to a co-operative which has certain tax advantages. I do not object to that. I am a member of this chamber and I pay taxes according to the rules of this chamber. If we are going to introduce a new atmosphere into the oil industry, then, surely, the taxation should be equitable. Is there any reason why, if I buy shares in company A, and you then compete with me in your co-operative, you do not pay any taxes; you take advantage of all the generous tax exemptions provided for co-operatives—which, I remind the minister, were provided for an entirely different purpose? I would like to hear the minister clarify that. Surely the thought had occurred to him. The thought must have entered his mind, if indeed it did not enter the minds of those with whom he entered into discussions. I ask the minister to tell us the tax plans with regard to this. I would be more favourably disposed to supporting the bill if he could tell us about those plans.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, this is not a bill that has within it any provisions of the taxation law. The way the tax law applies to this company is something that is obviously beyond the scope of the bill. I do not agree with what appears to be the opinion of the honourable senator that the tax laws affecting co-operatives are basically different from those affecting any other corporation, because, as I understand it, any corporation that wants to pay out its income by way of patronage dividends enjoys exactly the same tax rules and tax exemptions as those that apply to the co-operative movement. The only difference is that a co-operative may decide to distribute its profits or savings in a certain way, and a corporation may decide to dispose of its profits in another way; but the law is the same for all of them. It is simply applied in a different way if different action is taken by a company.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I suggest to the minister that he is entirely wrong. I also suggest that he knows that he is wrong when he says that the tax law is the same except that it is applied in a different way. We cannot have the same tax law apply in different ways. I know that, and so does the minister. He should not give me any nonsense about its being the same but being applied in different ways. That is your NDP philosophy, and it is not—

[Senator Phillips.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a point of order—

Senator Phillips: I will hear the Deputy Leader of the Government on his point of order, but I have heard him on so many procedural points of order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, when Senator Argue closed the debate on second reading, his remarks were followed by a question asked by Senator Phillips, which I believe Senator Argue attempted to answer, although obviously not to the total satisfaction of Senator Phillips. At the moment we are entering into a debate. I point out that the debate on second reading has been concluded. Senator Phillips will have two further opportunities to raise his concerns, namely, when the bill goes to committee—and I understand that Senator Argue is prepared to have the bill go to committee—and on third reading. In my respectful submission, the honourable senator is now entering into debate, when the debate on second reading has been concluded.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I suggest that we are again being subjected to censorship by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator speaking on the point of order?

Senator Phillips: Yes, on the point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Then the honourable senator may continue.

Senator Phillips: The point of order is simply this: Traditionally the Senate has allowed questions. I realize that my questions are awkward ones for the minister, but, to be perfectly frank, I intended them to be awkward. The minister is still attempting to answer—

Some hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Phillips: —and I have the privilege of asking questions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think the point of order has been well taken and maintained.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Argue moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Senate resumed from Thursday, May 13, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on February 10, 1982.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I made a commitment a short time ago that I would make a statement on the subject of defence. I have discussed the matter with the Minister of National Defence, and on this occasion I am speaking on his behalf, representing the views of the minister, burdened as he is with his substantial responsibilities.

Defence, however, is undisputedly at the very core of the responsibility of a national government, and it is right that this house play a role—indeed, an increasingly important role—in this vital area. Our interest in defence reflects a growing appreciation that we in Canada, and in the west, are entering a new era of turbulence and disruption. There is now a clear consensus that the post-Second World War era, that period which provided the basis for peace in Europe, is now behind us. Though disfigured by mass oppression in Eastern Europe, it nevertheless provided for relatively peaceful global decolonization on a scale unknown in history. It was at the same time a period of unprecedented expansion of production, wealth and opportunity which seemed to offer so much hope for peaceful change and development. All this is now behind us and we are embarked on a new period which is clearly a dangerous one.

Despite our hopes and dreams of what might have been, we are faced with the ceaseless build-up of military power on the part of the Soviet Union. Naked repression continues in Poland and in Afghanistan. As the bloody war between Iraq and Iran comes to an end, it is replaced by another outbreak of fighting in the Middle East, this time in Lebanon. Conflicts fester in Asia and Africa; and nearer to us, in Central and South America, the temperature continues to rise. I am sure that I do not have to draw your attention to the conflict in the Falkland Islands which has recently come to an end, showing to what extent old and new grievances continue to clamour for resolution, often by force of arms. Above all this, there remains the terrifying threat of nuclear war.

The great hope that many of us once entertained for a just and effective international order, of which the United Nations would be an essential part, seems hardly likely to be fulfilled in the foreseeable future.

Through all of this, the national governments of the free world find themselves necessarily preoccupied with the pressing problems and choices of unaccustomed economic difficulty and consequent social and political pressures. There is today a new level of concern in Canada about what all this means, about what specific action we should take, here in our own country and in the free world as a whole, to see our way through these difficult times. But, first, we must seek and secure the peace which is the necessary foundation for renewed progress and optimism.

The minister states that he must highly commend the late Senator McDonald's initiative in establishing the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. Under the leadership of Senator Lafond, the subcommittee has proven highly successful and provides a valuable service to Canada. It has become one of the most active committees of the Senate. He wants to congratulate the members of the Subcommittee on National Defence for their excellent work, and to assure them that the government and, in particular, the Cabinet Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence—of which I, honourable senators, am a member—has found their first report to be extremely useful and is looking forward to subsequent reports. Having said this, the minister wants to comment on the issue of implementation.

The question is not simply one of funding, even though implementation of the major recommendations of the first report would require fairly large doses of additional funds to be allotted to defence. It is rather a question of how Canada, as a member of the North Atlantic Alliance, is to respond to the still emerging security requirements of a changing and far from encouraging strategic setting.

It is the nature of these changes in the strategic setting and their implications for the collective security of the alliance that have been the focus of recent discussions within NATO. He believes that the alliance has emerged from this spring's meetings with a renewed sense of confidence—confidence in our ability to deal with the challenges which lie ahead.

The nuclear planning group meeting held in Colorado Springs was a most constructive and useful one. We dealt with a wide range of issues related to both nuclear arms and to arms control in general. The Minister of National Defence was most impressed by the strength of the consensus which continues to exist in favour of a balanced approach to collective initiatives regarding these two crucial security elements. President Reagan's recent initiatives with respect to strategic arms reductions have strengthened this balance, and the minister says that he certainly hopes that they get the serious response they deserve from the Soviet Union.

With the resumption of the process, that is, the strategic arms reduction talks, and the continuous INF and MBFR negotiations, the alliance will have in place, for the first time, a coherent and comprehensive set of arms control measures and initiatives that bear on the full spectrum of the force structures of both sides—strategic, theatre, nuclear and conventional. With respect to intermediate range nuclear weapons, there was strong support among alliance members for continued movement along the modernization track of the 1979 two-track decision. This was seen as a necessary incentive to the Soviet Union entering into serious arms control negotiations with regard to Euro-strategic systems.

Before leaving the issue of arms reduction negotiations, the minister mentions another subject raised at the NPG this spring, that is the announcement that Canada has entered into negotiations with the United States regarding the use of Canadian test and evaluation facilities, particularly for the Cruise missile system. It was extremely well received by all NATO colleagues. Certainly, the warmth of their reception reinforces the minister's belief in the wisdom of Canada's decision.

The ministerial meeting of the NATO Defence Planning Committee was held early this month in Brussels. The discussions focussed on issues very similar to those raised so well in the reports that we are examining here. One of the principal matters dealt with in these meetings was the presentation to ministers of "force goals" for the following 5-year NATO planning period.

The need to improve the conventional strength of the alliance was underlined at the DPC. This was necessary as a means both to raise the nuclear threshold and to compensate for forces committed to NATO, which, due to unforeseen national circumstances, may need to be deployed outside the NATO areas.

The current situation in the Falkland Islands is a case in point. Such unanticipated military developments, requiring a response by a member of the alliance, can arise very quickly and have significant ramifications. The potential for such developments in today's international environment appears great. One cannot predict such situations definitively, but it is important that, when such situations do arise, the member nations of NATO are able to respond in a timely and effective manner. Our ability to respond effectively may, in fact, ensure that such situations are less likely to arise in the future.

● (1450)

It is our hope that Britain's action in the South Atlantic in response to recent Argentinian aggression, and in support of liberty and international law, will serve to deter the use of force by other nations in similar disputes.

The firm support of Canada and the alliance for Britain's principled action will, states the minister, add to the overall deterrent effect.

Further, this demonstration that it may be necessary for national forces that are committed to NATO to be deployed outside of the NATO area makes it even more important that Canada's forces and those of other allies are fully able to assume their role effectively and that they can be relied upon if such a situation arises again.

The minister states that, as the Senate report is careful to point out, the force posture towards which we are still working was elaborated in the early 70s and adopted in 1975. However, this was before many of the trends that are now of such concern to us had developed and become so clear. The questions we in Canada and in other allied countries must grapple with are very difficult ones, and, while they are not entirely new or surprising, they are of the kind that take time to adequately assess and to then be reflected in policies and programs.

The defence program that we are familiar with was based, to a large degree, on the assumption that the nuclear aspects of deterrence would have continued stability, and on the related assumptions that armed conflict was in fact extremely unlikely; and that, in the unlikely event that there was a conflict, it would have been of short duration.

The government is in fact wrestling with the questions of how to create and maintain modern Canadian forces that are sustainable in combat in a way that permits the maintenance of an overall balance of capabilities at a cost that is affordable in the prevailing economic conditions. We are doing so not because we expect to have to fight a war, and still less because we want to, but because a credible conventional capability sustainable in combat appears today increasingly important and relevant to the maintenance of effective deterrence.

The report on manpower is extremely helpful, says the minister, in establishing a measure of requirements suited to the strategic situation now facing us and in identifying the options that may be available to us. He says that he can certainly tell honourable senators that the report is well informed and helpful. With very few exceptions, the Minister of National Defence agrees with it and accepts the good sense of virtually every one of the recommendations. Those that can be implemented without a new set of decisions by the government on changes to the overall balance and capabilities of the forces are already either being implemented, or are being studied with a view to seeing how they may best be implemented.

The minister then turns to a detailed discussion of our first report. He states that the first recommendation urges that the preparation of a white paper be undertaken immediately in order to assess manpower and other military requirements against our collective defence commitments and the threats to Canada. White papers on defence have been used mainly as vehicles by which the government lays before Parliament, and the public, decisions which it has taken on major new policies or on major changes in policy. In other words, they have been used as vehicles for announcing policy decisions rather than as mechanisms for stimulating public debate on policy issues and policy options. A decision by the government to undertake preparation of a new white paper on defence at some future date would indicate its intention to carry out a major review of its defence policy and of the force posture and resource allocations needed to give effect to it. It would appear, therefore, in the view of the minister, that the committee is in effect recommending the conducting of such a defence review.

The government has been sensitive to the gap which has been developing between the requirements of our defence undertakings and the availability of resources. This gap has been the subject of considerable concern and study both within the Department of National Defence and in Parliament. It is in this context of concern, brought on by a changing strategic situation, that a public review of the major defence issues now facing Canada, either preceding or accompanying a further review by the government, could prove useful as a source of advice to the government. The work already accomplished and ongoing of the Senate committee, as well as of the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, is an important contribution to such a public review, in the view of the minister and the government. The Minister of National Defence is considering how this work might best be integrated into a more comprehensive study in which Parliament clearly should be a leading participant.

Let me now turn to the second recommendation, manning levels and military viability.

The report recommends that military viability—that is, the capacity to execute competently the military tasks demanded of them—remain the essential criterion for judging the operations of armed forces. The subcommittee has expressed doubts that the establishments of the Canadian Forces are appropriate to their commitments and tasks. It suggests, for example, that Canada needs a strength of 108,000 troops and would be short about 20,000 trained and effective men and women if a general war broke out. It questions whether the reserves would provide adequate manpower, and feels that the augmentation of the Canadian Forces in Europe, and the provision of a brigade to the north flank of NATO, would leave less than adequate numbers for the defence of Canada.

The Minister of National Defence fully concurs in the recommendation that military viability remains the essential criterion for judging the operations of armed forces. The subcommittee's identification of a manning gap supports the assessment of the department. Of course, there have been changes in both the recognized manning ceiling and the actual manning of the forces. The strengths required to enable Canada's units and formations to be viable at the outbreak of hostilities, and in subsequent battle, has been identified in the past year in the Mobilization Planning Task Force Report, and in the ongoing Quinquennial Manpower Review.

Most importantly, the minister has, in a separate submission to Cabinet, as well as in the 1983-84 Strategic Overview, outlined what the Department of National Defence requires in terms of personnel, operations and maintenance, and capital procurement funding in order to viably meet and sustain Canada's military commitments. The committee's analysis and recommendations, in the view of the minister, will be most helpful to the government in examining these submissions from the Minister of National Defence.

Let me deal now with manning the commands and other sectors. The main part of the report analyzes in some detail the missions and the strengths of the functional commands and the other organizations which constitute the Canadian Forces. On behalf of the minister, I will touch briefly on each one.

The first deals with Canadian Forces in Europe. The examination of our forces in Europe focusses on the need to augment Canada's brigade in Germany during a crisis, and on its subsequent need for reinforcements. It then goes on to suggest that, in the final analysis, 7,600 troops are required in order to provide an effective and balanced land brigade in Europe. The committee has therefore urged, in recommendations 3 and 4, the minister says, that a NATO augmentation exercise be carried out as a first step towards recasting Canada's contribution to NATO; that our total military strength in Europe be increased to 7,800 by 1985; and that this strength reach 10,000 by 1987.

The Minister of National Defence shares the committee's concern that the augmentation of the Central European theatre, in order to bring units up to war strength, does indeed depend upon arrangements which could be disrupted in a real emergency. An augmentation exercise such as the committee recommends could probably be set up, albeit at considerable expense, but it is open to question whether it would really provide new information.

In studying the committee's concern that troop strength in CFE may be inadequate to meet the increased needs of sustained conventional land combat, the minister tends to share the views of the Senate committee. However, while the committee's estimate of the brigades' requirements do indeed reflect professional military advice, the government is also faced with suggested increases in the number of manned aircraft in the air group, as well as the need for more sustained administrative support for all of our forces in Europe. The department is, therefore, in the process of identifying the total numbers of personnel and materiel which would be needed in Central Europe in a crisis.

Honourable senators, I now make the unusual request that I be permitted to adjourn this debate at this point. A special Cabinet meeting has been called for 3.15 p.m. today, and I must be present. I would be pleased to continue with the balance of my remarks next week, if that is satisfactory to honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 28, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, June 28, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

To enable honourable senators to hear the budget speech, the sitting was suspended to resume at the call of the bell.

At 9.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL PRIVACY BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-43, to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGES IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Steuart be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Austin on, and the name of the Honourable Senator Stanbury be added to, the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Tuesday, June 29, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEETINGS—ALLOCATION OF ROOMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could pose a question on committees. Two committees are to meet tomorrow morning at 11.15. This causes a hardship to those senators who happen to be members of both committees, and who are interested in the activities of those committees. Is there no way that the times can be changed so that we can have proper attendance at both? Why are two committees sitting at the same time tomorrow?

● (2115)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I share the concern expressed by the honourable senator. I appreciate the problem, and we try very hard to avoid it. I agree that it is quite undesirable, but unfortunately we were unable to arrange the committee schedule any differently for tomorrow in view of the pressure of legislative business. I shall take note of what the honourable senator has said and we shall try to avoid placing senators in the position of wanting to attend committee meetings and finding themselves unable to do so.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, would the Deputy Leader of the Government advise us of the reason why the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on National Defence was unable to use room 256-S today. That subcommittee normally uses that room each week. The reason given for the move is that the CBC wanted to use room 256-S for interviews. Who gave the CBC permission to do that and to disrupt the subcommittee's schedule? Was permission given by the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, permission was not given by me or by anyone in the office of the Leader of the Government. I do not know the answer to that question, but I shall try to find out. I can say that neither I nor the Leader of the Government gave permission.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Did they take the majority for granted?

Senator Marshall: I hope the Deputy Leader of the Government will look into that. I will keep reminding him.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before putting some questions on the budget, I should say that I notice the absence from the chamber of the Minister of State for Economic Development, who normally would be the one to reply to such questions.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He is lucky to be abroad.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure it was planned in advance that he would be away this evening.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): No, no.

Senator Flynn: His place is here.

Senator Perrault: The minister is abroad in the service of the country.

Senator Flynn: I know it is in the service of the country, and it benefits the country when the minister is away. The farther away he is, the better it is. In any event, before we deal with this hypocritical budget—

An Hon. Senator: A good word.

Senator Flynn:—in order that we may be able to frame our perspective, I would like the Deputy Leader of the Government—it is usually his responsibility—to tell us exactly what is in store for the Senate before the Senate adjourns for the summer recess. I know that there will be the budget debate in the other place, which, I understand, will take at least six days. I am not certain whether it is the government's intention to continue with legislation, and for the other place to send us more bills than we have already received. We now have Bill C-43, but I would like to know exactly what is expected of the Senate under these rather peculiar circumstances.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can only give an opinion—

Senator Flynn: You should be able to give us more than that.

Senator Frith: I cannot make an exact prediction, but I can say that in my opinion it is unlikely we shall have any legislation in addition to that which we have already received, leaving aside the budget for the moment. We shall have to deal with any bills that were passed in the other place today. I do not know which bills were passed today, other than the one we have just received, Bill C-43. I am not certain whether they have passed the urea formaldehyde foam insulation bill; if so, we might get that.

It is my opinion that starting tonight and for the next six days the other place will be dealing with the budget. It is not clear whether any legislation will flow from that. The Leader of the Government may have something to add to what I have said.

I have not been told that any emergency legislation will arise from the budget. Therefore, I believe that the target is to adjourn at the end of next week and that, as implied in the question of the Leader of the Opposition, the only legislation we have to deal with is the legislation we have already received. The only other piece of legislation I can think of is the one I have mentioned.

Honourable senators, I had intended to speak to the Leader of the Opposition before this evening's sitting, but not having had the opportunity to do so I now ask him and other honourable senators present to consider whether it would be a good idea for the Senate to sit on Monday evening of next week in order to get a head start on our business. That would encourage committees to meet on Tuesday morning, and it is conceivable that we could finish before the other place.

Senator Flynn: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his comments. I agree with his suggestion that we sit next Monday evening, as long as there is the assurance that no other bills will come before us, apart from those passed today in the House of Commons. I understand that we have received Bill C-43, and I do not suppose that any other bill was given third reading in the other place today, otherwise we would have received it tonight.

Therefore, if the program for the Senate for this week and next week is to deal with the bills that are now before us, including the energy bills, Bill C-43, Bill C-115 and those which are on the Order Paper, then it is quite possible that we could adjourn on Thursday of next week.

I point out that if the six days allotted for the budget debate in the other place begin tomorrow, then next Thursday will be the last day of that debate. In that case, we would certainly be agreeable to the deputy leader's suggestion. I must conclude from his remarks that no legislation flowing from the budget will be presented before we adjourn for the summer. Of course, if the budget measures introduced tonight have a retroactive effect, as was the case with the November 12 budget, except for those measures that were cancelled—but that is another matter, and I do not know whether the same thing will happen with regard to the present budget—there will be no need to introduce the related legislation until we return in the fall either to continue this record session, as far as duration is concerned, or to start a new session, only the second of this Parliament.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have given my prediction based on my understanding, but life always has its surprises.

Senator Flynn: Even for you.

Senator Frith: By saying what I have just said, I do not mean to imply that I am expecting anything else. I have been completely candid. I agree with Senator Flynn that, as far as I know, all the budget measures introduced tonight can be implemented and take effect in the traditional way; that is, by the ways and means motions referred to by the Minister of Finance in his speech. At any rate, I have not been told of any legislation flowing from the budget. And if, as Senator Flynn has said, there are going to be six days of debate, there is no reason to believe that we will be receiving any legislation other than what we already have.

THE BUDGET PROVISIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask for some clarification respecting the statement made by the Minister of Finance, if there is anyone on the other side who at the moment feels inclined to clarify it. I realize that they probably heard the speech for the first time themselves tonight. It may be that I am a little premature in asking questions in respect of it.

● (2125)

I would ask, for example, if the government could give us a tabulation of those categories of persons who will be affected by the decision to reduce the indexing feature of our fiscal system to 6 per cent and those categories of persons who will not. I am particularly concerned to know whether the 6 per cent indexing feature is now to be applied to personal income tax. If so, perhaps the amount of the extra tax could be quantified. I think that in those other cases where the 6 per cent factor is involved we should know the quantification of the amount involved in the new policy, if that is clear. I should like to know who gains and who loses.

I should also like to know whether there are other types of expenditures besides expenditures benefiting persons who are included in this 6 per cent principle. Would it also involve payments to provinces? Are any government grants or fiscal transfers or matters of that sort included in this 6 per cent principle?

We were told by the minister that he is finding from other programs the money he wants for the employment transfers he has been talking about. Naturally, I am anxious to find out who gets and who gives with respect to this new arrangement, because at first hearing it appears that what is largely taking place is a re-ordering of priorities; in other words, money is being taken from current expenditure categories of various kinds and is being accumulated to support employment measures, which apparently amount to some $800 million in the present fiscal year. So I am really anxious to trace the flow of funds to see where the money is coming from and where it is going.

When we come to considering where the money is going, I should also like the minister to give us some idea of what the employment-creating—if I can use that completely inaccurate expression—feature of these revenue transfers is. There is so much for housing expenditures, so much for the creation of new jobs and all that kind of thing. I am interested to know what the government's estimate is of the number of new jobs that attaches to each one of those new programs. I have the feeling that, while these measures may be commendable in themselves—certainly, anything that creates jobs will be helpful to somebody—one really has to know how much is involved. We know that we have a 10.2 per cent rate of unemployment; we have 1,250,000 people out of work; we have lost one-quarter of a million jobs or more in the last year. I am anxious to know how far the government policies go towards filling that gap. That is an important piece of information, if we are to study the effect of the measures that we have heard about tonight.

It is probably not strictly in accordance with the rules, honourable senators, to ask a series of questions of this kind, but if the House has no objection I should like to continue, because I think the answers are important. We need the information, if we are to bring some informed comment to bear on the government's proposals.

What will the policy of the government be in respect of provincial legislation covering wages? I know that in the province of Manitoba, effective July 1, two different measures are coming into effect, one increasing the minimum wage by 15 per cent or thereabouts and one imposing a 1.5 per cent wage tax, some of which may be borne by the wage earners of the province. It is hard to tell at the moment what the actual fallout from that will be.

● (2130)

I should like to know what the government intends to say to the premier of my province with respect to those measures; whether it accepts them as part of the standard, or whether they should in any way be considered eligible for reconsideration now that this measure has been introduced. I think the 1.5 per cent wage tax is certainly eligible for reconsideration on almost any standard, but I should like to know whether the Government of Canada will make any suggestions to the government of my province in respect to that matter.

I should also like to know whether the government has made any study or estimate of the effect of the change in its cash requirements. When the November budget was announced, I remember well that the missing minister—I should not use that expression. He is not missing. We know dashed well where he ain't; he ain't here. I should say "the minister who isn't here." I do not mean the Honourable Senator Austin, because he is seldom here these days, but the one who pays some attention to our proceedings from time to time—fairly regularly, as a matter of fact—Senator Olson.

I remember last November his expatiating—going on at great length—as to how advantageous it would be to the Canadian economy because the government only intended to borrow $6.6 billion in order to meet its cash requirements. It is now three times that amount; its cash requirement is now $17.1 billion. I should like to know whether any study has been made as to the effect of this enormous demand on the savings of Canadians, in two particulars: first, to what extent is it crowding out the private sector; and, even more important, what will that do to the demand for money and, therefore, interest rates and the pressure on interest rates in Canada?

I presume that the Government of Canada has made a study of what this effect will be, because it seems to me that perhaps the most serious fact that has emerged from the statement we have heard this evening is the increase in the cash borrowing requirements of the government. For whatever reason, those requirements are now horrendous. When one looks at the $19.6 billion deficit, and translates that into American terms, one arrives at a deficit that is so close to $200 billion that no one would argue with me about it.

The Americans are having a difficult time getting used to the idea of having a deficit of $100 billion for the precise reason that it will create a demand upon the capital formation in the United States. It will put pressure on interest rates and affect the private sector accordingly if it seeks to expand.

What is the situation here in Canada? How do we assess the weight of this particular feature of the new statement we have heard this evening? It is a technical question, no doubt, but I am sure that the Minister of Finance and his people have some ideas as to what this situation is going to do to us.

There are several other points I could mention, and no doubt when I have had an opportunity to look over the statement in a more substantial form than the rather poor notes I have in front of me, I may be led to ask some more questions, but that might do for a start, and if my honourable friends opposite could let me have that information, hopefully by tomorrow's sitting, we may be able to continue our discussion of the extraordinary statement we heard this evening from the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I met with the Minister of Finance this afternoon in anticipation of one or two questions being asked this evening—perhaps even more than one or two!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He was able to spare that time, was he?

Senator Perrault: Every effort will be made by the government to provide answers to questions asked about this evening's budget presentation by the Minister of Finance. The questions asked by the Honourable Senator Roblin are indeed important questions. I have replies to some of his questions. Might I suggest that there may be value in incorporating some of the replies in the remarks I intend to deliver tomorrow on the subject of the Honourable Senator Phillips' motion?

● (2135)

Senator Flynn: That's good.

Senator Perrault: Through a happy coincidence I had pledged to make a speech on the state of the economy.

Senator Flynn: You knew that the occasion would arise.

Senator Perrault: I had only an inkling, and it may be an opportunity for other senators as well to participate in a discussion about this evening's budget and allied matters.

I have some information about job creation because, after all, the fundamental purpose of presenting a new budget—

Hon. Martial Asselin: How many jobs?

Senator Perrault: —is to get inflation under some kind of reasonable control and to restore confidence in the economy—

Senator Asselin: How about reducing deficits?

Senator Perrault: —but, most of all, to try to provide employment opportunities for Canadians, many of whom are having a great deal of difficulty.

As to the question about the number of jobs that it is hoped will be created, estimates are not precise. It is hoped that over a two-year period 250,000 jobs can be provided directly, and, hopefully, there would also be indirect benefits flowing from the program.

As to direct job creation, as program specifics of the expanded direct job creation and economic development programs are not yet in place, precise job creation estimates would obviously be premature, and I am only providing a guesstimate when I say 250,000. The Minister of Employment and Immigration and others will no doubt be providing this type of information in the course of announcing specific initiatives.

The basic point is that within the constraint of not further raising our deficit we believe we have reallocated expenditures in a way which will contribute as much as possible both to immediate job creation and to general economic recovery. The 65,000 jobs associated with the new housing initiatives is a CMHC estimate and is intended to refer to person-years of employment. It implies a very low cost per job created as it is anticipated that the new incentives will lever much larger amounts of private spending. The $200 million new direct employment allocation mentioned by the minister could well create something in the order of 15,000 person-years of direct employment. The Department of Employment and Immigration will probably set out this program impact in terms of jobs as a substantially larger number of jobs than of person-years will be involved as most of the jobs will be well short of a year's duration.

In addition to the employment associated with this new allocation, there will be the employment associated with the $150 million localized light construction and other projects also being announced now. The estimate here is perhaps 5,000 person-years of employment and 16,000 jobs, and the $100 million already available for direct employment creation from existing employment and immigration allocations.

The $300 million for economic development programs, the $500 million interest assistance for small business, farmers and fishermen, and the lower interest rates made possible when the tax document proposals are implemented, will all create and save jobs, but estimated impacts are inevitably much more speculative, according to the minister.

The total expenditure level for employment programs at the present time, the $350 million announced in the budget—$200 million for direct job creation and $150 million for labour intensive capital programs—is in addition to some $450 million which has already been approved for direct job creation over the next two fiscal years. This brings the government's total commitment for direct job creation to more than $775 million for fiscal years 1982-83 and 1983-84.

In addition, the government will direct some $800 million to net training expenditures in 1982-83 and $120 million to the summer youth employment program. In total, direct government expenditure on employment and training will amount to approximately $1.4 billion in 1982-83 and will be maintained at this level for 1983-84. It should be remembered that, in addition, the government has authorized up to $170 million in job creation projects and $340 million in work-sharing projects under the Unemployment Insurance Act in fiscal 1982-83 and 1983-84.

● (2140)

Obviously, the matter of the status of certain provincial government programs, which have been announced in the provinces, will be dealt with when the Right Honourable the Prime Minister meets with the provincial first ministers later this week. I imagine that it will be the intention of the Prime Minister to make a number of comments after that meeting has taken place.

I will have further information on the subject of job creation tomorrow, which I will be pleased to bring to the chamber.

Senator Roblin raised a question concerning job classification categories which will be subject to the 6 per cent ceiling. In this regard, I do not have a specific list this evening, but I will endeavour to obtain that. However, I can make the following general comments.

The choice of a specific ceiling number is, admittedly, somewhat arbitrary. In selecting 6 per cent, the government is seeking to strike a balance between a ceiling which is sufficiently low to provide a clear and significant leadership signal effect for the rest of the economy, and a ceiling which is not so low as to be grossly unfair or excessively disruptive to personal budget plans.

The inflation rate in the United States, Canada's main trading partner, is currently in the 6 to 7 per cent range, and it is thus appropriate that Canadians strive to lower their rate to at least this level in order to remain internationally competitive.

Also, since 1980 the Bank of Canada has been targeting for money supply growth in a four percentage point span centred on 6 per cent and, from this perspective, this figure would also appear to be an appropriate guideline for price and income increases.

With Canada's inflation rate currently being in the 11 to 12 per cent range, and Canadian income settlements running at

[Senator Perrault.]

12 to 13 per cent, the 6 per cent ceiling does require a large incremental downward adjustment. I think we all recognize that. However, with the substantial degree of slack productivity capacity in Canada at the present time, with the continuing strongly anti-inflationary thrust of monetary and fiscal policies, and with the urgency of getting inflation down, given the more rapid progress being made in some other countries, the government believes that the 6 per cent ceiling is both achievable and essential for the long-term strength of the Canadian economy. I will endeavour to provide some specific lists of areas to be covered by this 6 per cent tomorrow evening.

Senator Roblin is aware of the general statement made by the minister tonight with respect to Parliament and crown corporations, but I will certainly have some more information on that subject later.

As yet, I do not have replies to a number of questions asked by the honourable senator. However, I imagine that within the next few hours a number of questions will be asked by those in business and in public life. An earnest effort will be made to bring that information to the Senate tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand, then, that the Leader of the Government is going to make his speech on Senator Phillips' motion tomorrow?

Senator Perrault: Tomorrow or Wednesday; whatever is satisfactory to the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: It is important for us to know because if, in fact, the Leader of the Government is going to make his speech tomorrow, we may wish to put questions to him now. On the other hand, we could postpone asking questions if he does not intend to make his speech tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I pledged that I would make that speech by Wednesday of this week. I would be prepared to make a statement relating to the budget and the economic condition of the country if that is satisfactory, or, if it is more convenient, I would be pleased to do it on Wednesday.

It may be that in the intervening time more questions that the opposition would like to have answered will arise, and I will undertake to obtain that information and bring it to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: On the whole, I think it would be better if the Leader of the Government made his speech tomorrow. There may be as few senators here on Wednesday as there are this evening. I hope that the attendance in the chamber will be a little better tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): They are all out celebrating the news of the road back to recovery.

Senator Flynn: They probably are, but they are doing it in hiding.

● (2150)

There is one question that I ask the government leader to deal with when he speaks tomorrow. How can the reduction of the indexing to 6 per cent be compared to an increase in the tax rate? I would like to find out whether there is some advantage to reducing the indexing as opposed to increasing the tax.

Senator Roblin: It is the same thing.

Senator Flynn: I think that a lot of people would like to understand exactly why the government is choosing that route rather than the more frank route of an increase in tax.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think that if one studies the text of the remarks of the Minister of Finance one will be able to identify where he said that for some it will, in effect, result in an increase in taxation. I believe he used those words tonight. I shall be pleased, however, to talk about the indexing and its implications in the course of my remarks tomorrow.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. When the Leader of the Government has the floor tomorrow, could he give us a few explanations, first of all on this evening's acknowledgement by the Minister of Finance that last fall's budget was a disaster; second, on the minister's statement that he had miscalculated the deficit projected in last fall's budget?

This evening, the word is that we have an unheard of deficit of $19.6 billion. The minister admits that the government must regain the confidence of Canadians and strengthen the economy. How does the Minister of Finance intend to reconcile all this, since his budget makes no provision for bringing down this huge deficit of $19.6 billion, and there is no mention of by how much government spending will be cut in the course of the year in order to restore investor confidence in the Canadian economy and to help bring down interest rates?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I felt that the speech made by the Minister of Finance this evening reflected refreshing candour.

Senator Flynn: In comparison to last November!

Senator Perrault: He said that we are searching for a way out of our current difficulty, which we are, no matter which party we belong to. Provincial premiers of the various political persuasions are faced with exactly the same kind of problem that we, as a government, face on a national basis.

Senator Asselin: Yes, but tonight the Minister of Finance was unable to explain the government deficit of $19.6 billion.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would be glad to say a word or two about that. Mr. MacEachen said:

It is no comfort to know that the United States is a victim of the same recession. So are all the industrial countries of Europe and, even more cruelly, the developing world. The recession is international. Some of our problems are of our own making—

Yes, that is correct, they are of our own making. Some mistakes have been made; he stated that.

—but a large part comes from abroad. That is why the speed of our move towards recovery cannot be determined by Canada alone.

Who in this chamber would dispute that statement, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Certainly not Senator Bosa.

Senator Perrault: Who would dispute the fact that fundamental and full recovery must await the return of our export markets? For example, as the Honourable Senator Bell from British Columbia is aware, we cannot trigger a recovery of the forest industry based on domestic sales alone. The same holds true for the mining industry. We in this chamber know that, of course, although at times we become rather political. All of us, however, regardless of our political persuasion, know that fundamental and full economic recovery awaits a return to a healthy world economy.

● (2200)

Senator Asselin: What did he do to reduce the deficit?

Senator Perrault: He said:

My purpose tonight is to offer Canadians a way to end the recession, and to speed our progress towards recovery through immediate action.

He said this last fall. This is the minister's position. Last November's forecast was admittedly wrong.

Those are his words. He went on to say that it was, however, quite consistent with the views being expressed by the private sector forecasters with unanimity—Data Resources, the Conference Board and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. Last fall most forecasters had expected that the U.S. economy would recover early in 1982 and that interest rates would begin to decline.

Honourable senators, regardless of our political affiliations, we know that this is true. We know this is an accurate statement.

Mr. MacEachen continued by saying that the real GNE in the U.S. is now expected to decline by one and one-half per cent this year, that interest rates are likely to remain high, and that his new forecast reflects these revisions.

Now we talk in terms of the deficit. There has been a concerted attempt, and a largely successful attempt, to fight excessive costs and excessive waste. The reason why the deficit has increased to its present proportions is a decline on the revenue side. Honourable senators know that. When you are not selling lumber products or mining products the tax revenue is not there. That is the way the increase is created. I will, however, go into that to a greater extent tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could add a couple of items to the questions I have already asked of my honourable friend.

Without wishing to debate with him the estimates given on November 12 last year, I think it is generally accepted by the economic forecasters in Canada that the minister had better information, but he refused to use it because he had already written his budget speech and did not want to spoil it. However, we will not get into that, now, otherwise we will be here all night.

When I consider that deficit of $19.6 billion, I do not know how this country is going to get out of this predicament.

This is the question I would like my honourable friend to answer: What proportion of the total intake of the federal government will be required to pay the interest on that debt? I would like to know that figure. It is 23 cents on the dollar now. What is it going to be as a result of this new figure that has been given to us? I have to admit that I was a piker. I thought it might go up to $17 billion or $18 billion, but I certainly see that I am not in a position to give a forecast on that subject.

I would like to ask my honourable friend if he will give us a clear statement of those items in the budget of November 12, 1981 that have been dropped, but which are effective and still in the mix. I am particularly concerned to know the timing of these things, because as I heard the minister tonight he made some further changes in his budget—if you can believe it—some of which were limited as to time. They were only a postponement of something which, in my opinion, was bad in the first place and should have been dropped entirely. I am anxious to get clarification on what has happened to the 1981 budget, what was thrown out, what was modified, what is still alive, so that the poor taxpayers of this country can have those points put to rest. How you can conduct a business with such a budget still floating around at the end of June I cannot imagine.

I also would like my honourable friend to clarify for me the amounts that are new allocations of expenditures for employment creation, and those which are already in the package, like the sharing of time in factories, and charges against the unemployment insurance fund, because, as I listened to the minister on the television tonight, he had me thoroughly mixed up as to what he was talking about that was new, and what he was talking about that was already in effect.

On that point, what is the policy of the government about financing the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund? We have had drafts drawn on that fund to the tune of, I think, close to $500 million. I may be overstating the amount, but I think it is in that neighbourhood. An amount of $500 million is being taken from the unemployment insurance fund to finance a lot of these moves. Somebody has to make that up. It has to be paid for. It is paid for either by the government making it up, or by employers and employees, the workers and the owners of firms, paying it through an increase in the unemployment insurance rates that they pay on their weekly or monthly payrolls.

I would like the minister to clarify that point for me. This has been raised before in this house, once by me and a couple of times by my honourable friend from Nova Scotia, Senator Donahoe, and we have never had a satisfactory answer. We were told, as I recall, that when this new statement known as the budget came down that point would be clarified. I would, therefore, like my honourable friend to make that particular point clear, if he will. It would help me a good deal in trying to understand exactly what particular horse is being sold to us tonight.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a response to at least one of the questions asked by Senator Roblin and others, including Senator Asselin.

In November last a budgetary deficit of $10.5 billion for the fiscal year 1982-83 was projected. Now we are forecasting a deficit of $19.6 billion. The increase in the projected deficit this year is almost entirely the result of the operation of automatic stabilizer mechanisms within the fiscal system. I think this was mentioned earlier this evening by the Minister of Finance. He said that it does not to a significant degree reflect discretionary actions designed to stimulate the economy; however, it is true that the widening of the deficit will provide an offset to the short-term weakening in other sources of aggregate demand within the economy, and thereby help stabilize the level of economic activity.

The minister states that the weakening in the economy has led to slower growth in the tax bases, personal income, corporate profits, imports, and so on, and thereby to slower revenue growth. At the same time, unemployment insurance benefit payments have risen with the level of unemployment.

This is one of the automatic stabilizer mechanisms which he mentioned. He went on to say that interest charges on borrowing to finance the growing deficit have also risen, that the currently projected growth in nominal GNP this year is over 5 percentage points lower than forecasters generally expected last fall, and that under these circumstances it is virtually inevitable that the deficit will rise dramatically.

Honourable senators know that figure. I will be glad to provide further comment tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: Will my honourable friend be sure to deal with the question of the cash requirements of the government? The deficit is one thing, and is horrendous enough, but the cash requirements—that is, the drain on the savings of Canadians, and the burden being imposed on future generations to pay for this extraordinary situation—need to be clarified. When one considers that the cash requirements have risen from $6.6 billion to $17.1 billion, which is an increase of close to three times, as compared to an almost doubling of the actual deficit, their impact has to make everybody very concerned indeed. I hope that when the minister speaks on my colleague's motion tomorrow he will be sure to deal with the question of cash requirements and its effect on the Canadian economy.

Senator Perrault: I will do that.

Senator Roblin: I will be listening.

Senator Flynn: I would appreciate also knowing whether the government side approves the motion, since it calls for a new budget, which we now have.

Senator Perrault: We have been doing some creative thinking about the wording.

Senator Flynn: About the reply?

Senator Frith: And, as usual, accepting constructive criticism.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government in the Senate has undertaken to clarify some aspects of the budget as a result of the questions put to him tonight, I wonder if he would clarify one further point for me. It was announced tonight that increases for members of Parliament would be limited to 6 per cent for the year ending in July 1983 and 5 per cent for the following year. What will happen with regard to those salary or contract settlements that took place prior to today? There were settlements in the neighbourhood of 12 and 13 per cent in other segments of society. Will they be subject to revision, or will they be allowed to stand?

● (2210)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the guidelines described by the Minister of Finance this evening do not apply to the private sector. They serve as an example to the rest of the community. We hope that, starting with provincial governments and other governments in this country, the example will be followed by those in the private sector.

In my view, one of the best phrases used by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech this evening was that 12 per cent represents the world of recession and 6 per cent represents the world of recovery. That is what we hope for: the world of recovery. It is a challenge to a free society to demonstrate that responsible men and women, conscious of their responsibilities for the national good, will act responsibly and will not ask more of the nation than the nation is able to provide in terms of salary and wage increases.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I was referring to other segments of society, but not necessarily the private sector.

Senator Asselin: Yesterday the railroad employees accepted 12 per cent, as did the CBC employees.

Senator Bosa: I am referring to that particular sector of society that falls within the federal jurisdiction. The Leader of the Government does not have to give me the answer now.

Senator Perrault: I will take the question as notice and will attempt to deal with it tomorrow.

PRIVACY BILL, 1980

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to government files containing personal information relating to themselves".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we now have Bill C-43 before us, which bill deals with the privacy problem involved in this measure, I ask leave to withdraw Bill S-9.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 23, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on February 10, 1982.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the courtesy you extended last week in allowing me to adjourn the debate on the consideration of this report when it was necessary for me to attend a meeting of Cabinet. As a consequence of attending that meeting I was unable to complete the statement I was in the process of delivering on behalf of the Minister of National Defence. There is only a comparatively short portion of it remaining.

Hon. Martial Asselin: If the Leader of the Government is prepared to table it, we will accept it.

Senator Perrault: I would rather present it. We have not yet accepted the congressional style of debate. It might establish a dangerous precedent.

An Hon. Senator: But it might save a lot of time.

Senator Perrault: No doubt it would. Honourable senators, the minister expressed great interest in the Senate proposals regarding troop strength and CFE.

In studying the committee's concern that troop strengths in CFE may be inadequate to meet the increased needs of sustained conventional land combat, the minister tends to share its views. However, while the estimates of the brigade's requirements do indeed reflect professional military advice, the government is also faced with suggested increases in the number of manned aircraft in the air group, as well as the need for more sustained administrative support for all our forces in Europe. The department is therefore in the process of identifying the total numbers of personnel and materiel which would be needed in central Europe in a crisis.

The committee's examination of Mobile Command questioned the viability of the land forces which we have committed to Norway and to Denmark, the adequacy of the number of troops remaining in Canada after the implementation of our NATO commitments, and the adequacy of the manning, equipment and tasking of the militia and the supplementary reserve.

Recommendation 6 suggests a review of our commitment of a brigade and a battalion group to the north flank of NATO.

Recommendations 5 and 7 recommend a significant increase in the strength of Mobile Command; and recommendation 8 suggests an overhaul and expansion of the reserves.

The committee's assessment of the difficulties of meeting the land portion of our north flank undertaking is indeed consistent with that of the Minister of National Defence. In an effort to resolve at least some of these obstacles, the government has already approved the prepositioning, in Norway, of the equipment for the lead battalion group.

The figures and conclusions in regard to both the regular force strength of Mobile Command and the land reserves, although a year and a half old, remain substantially correct. The subcommittee on National Defence has, in fact, put its finger on an issue which is of concern to most of the countries of the North Atlantic Alliance—the need for stronger conventional land forces, both regular land reserve, capable of resisting a Warsaw Pact thrust without having to immediately resort to nuclear weapons. The total force concept, based on both the regulars and reserves, and now adopted for the Canadian Forces, is a response to this concern. However, as can be well understood, before major changes in regular and reserve force strengths, organizations, missions, equipment and training can be effected, such changes must necessarily be preceded by policy decisions by the government, which address the degree to which the changing conventional force needs of deterrence can or should be met by adjustments to Canada's military posture.

The Minister of National Defence has given considerable attention to this issue and, as I mentioned earlier, intends to submit to the Cabinet his assessment of the current ability of Canada's forces to meet and sustain their commitments in a crisis, as well as policy and funding options which would address deficiencies.

The report then turned to a discussion of Maritime Command. The minister believes that the subcommittee will have much more to say on naval matters when it presents its second report and he is looking forward with great interest to its conclusions and recommendations in regard to Maritime Command. It is perhaps wise, he suggests, for us to wait for that report before commenting.

The subcommittee's examination of Air Command recognized a shortage of personnel within Air Command, and the close relationship in that environment of personnel strength to equipment. The report also focused on the desirability of being able to airlift a brigade of troops into Canada's northern and coastal frontier region. Recommendation 12 suggests that current shortages be met but that no further increases be provided unless equipment holdings are increased. Recommendation 11 urges a northern airlift exercise.

[Senator Perrault.]

The basic premise underlying the Senate committee's recommendations on the manning of Air Command is correct, although the minister states that the situation and, in particular, the identification of detailed personnel requirements evolves over time. In regard to the suggestion that we be able to airlift a brigade into the north, the minister believes that without getting into classified details, our intelligence assessment of the threat to Canada's north does not really justify that sort of capability. This does, of course, raise the policy issue of the priority which Canada should give to northern defence and whether the threat of Russian attack is the sole criterion to determine our capability in this area.

Recommendation 13 proposes an immediate expansion of the training system, in order to meet, among other goals, the needs of mobilization. The Department of National Defence is, in fact, in the process of identifying additional training resource needs for both peacetime and wartime expansion.

• (2220)

Recommendation 14 urges that the cadet movement be given further recognition and all possible support. The government recognizes the services the Canadian cadet organizations perform in forming good citizens, fostering qualities of leadership and discipline and in encouraging positive attitudes towards Canada's armed forces. The government will continue to support the Canadian cadet organization to the fullest extent possible.

With regard to personnel, the report provided a separate chapter on specific problems. After examining a number of interrelated personnel issues, it recommended, in Recommendation 15, that combat-readiness be re-emphasized, that greater consultation be carried out with the operational commands and that defence organizations be addressed.

The Minister of National Defence concurs with much of this analysis and the department has already taken many steps to correct the problems that have been identified. The commanders of operational commands now attend the minister's defence council meeting as well as the key departmental Defence Management Committee meetings.

In regard to organization, the subcommittee's suggestion that commands be given a greater role does indeed have its proponents; however, there are also those who recommend quite the opposite—that is, that the senior general in each environment be located permanently in Ottawa, close to the center of decision-making. The minister states that perhaps this is an issue which is sorting itself out through quiet evolution.

In Recommendation 16, the subcommittee's report also urges the Department of National Defence to seek certain exemptions from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This issue received a flurry of publicity a few months ago. The department has, subsequent to the report, identified those specific areas which could cause problems. However, as with any new law of this nature, the way in which it will be interpreted by the courts will take some time to ascertain. In the meantime, the Minister of Justice does not feel that we have a problem.

The subcommittee report ends with a section entitled, "The Canadian Forces in the Future". It proposes that the manning of the Canadian Forces be increased beyond the currently planned level, and that, "The entire defence structure should also be made more combat-effective." It recommends a regular force strength of 85,000 by 1985 and a strength of 91,800 by 1987. It also recommends a total reserve strength of 47,500.

It is, of course, always difficult to identify with any precision the military requirements of the future. The subcommittee developed its suggested force model without the benefit of the departmental studies which have since been carried out on the requirements of sustained conventional combat in Europe and the mobilization needs of the Canadian Forces. Nevertheless, in the view of the minister, the judgment which is reflected in the report is consistent with the general thrust of these studies. What is at issue is the question of how long Canada should be able to sustain its military commitments in conventional combat. This is an issue which, as the minister mentioned earlier, the government will be addressing over the summer months.

The report identifies the costs associated with its recommended increase in manning. These figures reflect the data which the department provided the subcommittee in November, 1981 and are reasonable and adequate for planning purposes. However, the subcommittee has also identified costs for the necessary equipment associated with such an increase. The minister admits that these figures appear to be rather modest. It is indeed correct that much of the increase would be used on currently under-manned equipment or prepositioned equipment. However, the department's estimates of the initial additional capital requirements for an increase in force structure are substantially higher than those indicated in the report.

In discussing funding, the subcommittee appears to be well aware of the projected size of the defence envelope. Nevertheless, it calls for more expenditure on defence implying that the additional personnel costs—in the order of $350 million per year—should be added to the current commitment to increase the defence budget by 3 per cent per annum.

There is no doubt that an increase in personnel, such as the report has recommended, would necessarily have to be accompanied by the required additional funding. The defence envelope is very tightly programmed and there is therefore very little flexibility in it which would enable a transfer of funds from capital to personnel. Without an increase in the defence envelope, an increase in personnel would place acute pressure on both the capital program and the operations and maintenance of existing forces.

In conclusion, the Minister of National Defence shares the concern of the subcommittee for the capability of the Canadian Forces to meet all assigned commitments now; to augment and reinforce the combat elements to a viable level from a limited resource base in an atmosphere of increasing risk; and, in the event of war, to sustain the commitments in a militarily feasible way for an appropriate length of time. The minister thus supports the subcommittee's identification of an imbalance between commitments and resources and the requirement to resolve it. It should, however, be noted that despite the validity of the analysis and recommendations in the subcommittee's report, an increase in manning will not, alone, solve the dilemma in defence. The capital requirements to meet our authorized force posture will, as in the case of personnel, not be met for some time even at a continued budgetary growth rate of 3 per cent. An increased force structure would, to a considerable degree, further exacerbate this difficulty.

However, as the minister states, the Senate report has shown that a gap exists between mission and resources and has clearly identified the dilemma facing the government in addressing this problem. In this sense it has performed an undeniable service.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not about to make a speech, but I take it that the minister has given the official government response to the Senate report and, no doubt, the members of the committee will read it with some interest. My question is: Did the minister say anything about the basic recommendation of that report, that there should be a new white paper on defence?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, as I do not have the immediate documentation at hand.

Senator Roblin: I guess my ears did not deceive me. I listened for that point and heard nothing about it. It is really the key recommendation of the report, as I understand the matter. If the minister could tell us what the government is going to do about that white paper, I would be very happy to know.

Hon. Charles McElman: Would the Leader of the Government accept a question with respect to the military, as it relates to the budget, and perhaps provide an answer tomorrow?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator McElman: I have before me a document, which is one of the budget papers, entitled "Supplementary Information and Notice of Ways and Means Motion on the Budget". The second part of Table 2.3, on page 13, which is headed "Government of Canada Budgetary Reallocations", deals with "Funds made available for reallocation from:" and the fifth item down is "Military pay and defence reprofiling". The allocation for fiscal year 1982-83 is $100 million and for fiscal year 1983-84 another $100 million, which means a reduction in those two fiscal years in defence spending through military pay and defence reprofiling of $200 million. Would the Leader of the Government make an inquiry and obtain information defining the reduction in military pay—whether, for example, it is a reduction of numbers in the forces—and defence reprofiling with respect to expenditures?

Senator Perrault: I would be pleased to take the question as notice and attempt to reply tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government is prepared to take questions as notice, I wonder if he would accept another one.

● (2230)

I should like to refer to a news release which came to my desk today. It is dated June 18, 1982, and reads as follows:

Defence Minister Gilles Lamontagne has announced pay increases for Canadian Forces Reserve personnel below the rank of Brigadier-General retroactive to April 1st. The overall increase averages 11.0 per cent.

The new rates of pay continue the policy of comparability between the Regular Force and the Reserve Force.

Will these increases now be subject to the new policy announced by the minister tonight and will increases for both the regular force and the reserve force be reduced to 6 per cent?

Senator Perrault: I will deal with that question tomorrow, honourable senators.

Hon. G. I. Smith: You will have a busy day tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Tonight!

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 4487.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration on Wednesday, July 14, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the supplementary budget of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ATTEND LAUNCHING OF ANIK D 1 AT CAPE CANAVERAL, FLORIDA

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to report that the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have received an invitation to attend an event in Florida on August 12, 1982.

I think I can best explain the nature of the event by reading portions of a letter from those who have invited us, Telesat Canada. It reads in part:

On behalf of the Chairman and Board of Directors of Telesat Canada, I am pleased to invite you to join us for the launching of Telesat's Anik D 1 communications satellite from Cape Canaveral, Florida, on 12 August, 1982.

The official launch activities include a private tour of the J.F. Kennedy Space Centre on the morning of the 12th, followed by a buffet luncheon sponsored by our spacecraft contractors, Spar Aerospace Limited and Hughes Aircraft Company.

I am advised and believe that in order for members of the committee to go to another country, and to submit an account for expenses, the consent of the Senate is necessary. I am instructed by the committee to seek that consent, and in a moment I shall ask leave to move a motion.

I can assure the Senate that no additional funds are required because there is sufficient unexpended money in the budget of the committee to provide for the expenses of any senators who are able to accept the invitation. Up to the moment I believe that the number of acceptances will be very limited because of long-standing commitments of many members of the committee to other events at that time of the year. So far as I am now aware, it is unlikely that the total delegation will exceed two, but I cannot confirm that.

● (1410)

Accordingly, honourable senators, I now move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to send representatives to the launching of Telesat Canada's Satellite Anik D 1 on August 12, 1982, in Cape Canaveral, Florida.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-115 TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare, and Science to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-115, intituled: "An Act to establish a national program for occupational training", has, in obedience to its order of reference of Tuesday, June 1, 1982, examined the said subject-matter and now reports the same with no recommendation for amendment to the Bill.

In the course of its study, your Committee held three meetings with the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Employment and Immigration. At these meetings the Committee discussed with the Minister the amendments that would be introduced to Bill C-115. These amendments were introduced into the legislation and passed by the House of Commons on June 22, 1982. Hence, they are incorporated in Bill C-115 as the bill now appears before the Senate.

In the course of its deliberation, your Committee invited the provincial ministers concerned, or their senior officials with responsibility for manpower training, to appear before your Committee. In this regard your chairman contacted the Honourable Bette Stephenson, Minister of Education and Minister of Colleges and Universities of the Province of Ontario, who also acted as spokesperson for the other provincial ministers with responsibility for manpower training. In addition your Committee had communication with a senior official of the Ministry of Labour, Manpower and Income Security of the Province of Quebec and with Mr. James D. Horsman, Minister of Advanced Education and Manpower of the Province of Alberta regarding the subject-matter of Bill C-115.

Your Committee wishes to thank the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy for consenting to appear. I would also like to thank the members of the Committee for their attendance and the dispatch with which this study was undertaken.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL,
Chairman

THE BUDGET

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government.

Yesterday evening, I mentioned the government's astronomical deficit of $19.6 billion, and I cannot accept the answer I received from the Minister of State.

[Senator Bonnell,]

There was some curiosity as to how the interest would be paid on this $19.6 billion deficit. Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate how much the government will be paying in interest on the money markets?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have some information from the Minister of Finance that I would be pleased to share with honourable senators relating to the matters referred to by the Honourable Senator Asselin.

● (1415)

Deficits of this order of magnitude—and we are talking here of a deficit of almost $20 billion, whether or not this may lead to higher interest rates and higher inflation—would be clearly incompatible with reduced levels of inflation and interest rates if the economy were more buoyant. It is the minister's view, however, that under the current circumstances, with the economy in deep recession, and with the personal savings rate running well above 13 per cent, the deficit is having a minimal impact on inflation and interest rate levels.

I believe that last night I did provide an answer, which Senator Asselin has described as "unsatisfactory", but I have presented the minister's explanation and his views with respect to the inquiry.

[Translation]

IMPACT ON INTEREST RATES

Hon. Martial Asselin: To go on to something else, could the minister inform us where, in the budget brought down yesterday evening by the Minister of Finance, we could find any assurance for Canadians that there will be a drop in interest rate levels in the near future? Has the minister included measures in his budget to bring down interest rates?

To listen to the news on radio and television this morning, it would seem that businessmen are not at all happy with the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, and that is because it contains no measures providing for a reduction in interest rates within the near future. Can the minister inform us whether he has been able to find anything in the budget speech that will help bring down interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Well, the thrust of the budget is, of course, to reduce the rate of inflation. The Minister of Finance talked in terms of 6 per cent being the "recovery rate". The government holds the view that since 1975 the Bank of Canada has been applying a gradualist monetary policy in an effort to reduce inflation. In retrospect it may have been a little too gradual. We might be in a better position now if interest rates over the last five years had been somewhat higher. It is also important to recognize that the rate of inflation reflects the shocks the world economy has undergone from 1973 to the end of 1981, with an increase of over 650 per cent in world oil prices, a 225 per cent increase in the energy component of the Canadian consumer price index, a series of bad harvests, leading to sharp food increases, and a 20 per cent devaluation of the Canadian dollar relative to the U.S. dollar.

The continuation of the Bank of Canada's monetary policy, in the view of the minister and the government, is one of the major factors leading us to project a gradual reduction in the rate of inflation over the forthcoming period.

With regard to the effect of high interest rates on small businessmen, farmers and fishermen, and the hope which may exist in the future for a reduction in those rates to provide help for them, it is the view of the government that the high interest rates reflect, rather than cause, the high levels of inflation we are currently experiencing. At the most fundamental level the cost of money to borrowers, and the return to savers, must reflect the actual and expected level of inflation.

While high interest rates appear to exacerbate rather than mitigate inflation by raising borrowing costs, this is more than offset by the beneficial effect on the demand for credit, goods and services, and in turn on inflation and inflationary expectations. However, in recognition of the limited ability of some farmers and small businessmen to absorb the full impact of the adjustment to high interest rates, the federal government in the November 12, 1981 budget, which has been the subject of so much discussion in the chamber, extended the use of small business bonds, provided additional credit to the farming sector of preferential rates of interest, and increased the loan ceilings under the Small Business Loans Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. This new budget provides additional stimulus to incorporated and unincorporated small businesses by providing interest reduction grants to reduce the effect of the interest rate by 4 percentage points on loans to finance certain new investments.

● (1420)

In the longer term the discussion paper on inflation and the taxation of personal investment income proposes a review of the taxation system and the impact of inflation on this sector. If these proposals are accepted, small businessmen, farmers and fishermen will be better able to cope with inflation and high interest rates in the future.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING—INFLATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary. The Leader of the Government will agree that to bring down inflation, we must cut government spending and reduce the deficit. That is what they did in the United States, and that is why their rate of inflation is only 6 per cent.

Since the government has often blamed Canada's economic slump on the U.S. or other countries, has it not occurred to the government that if it had wanted to bring inflation down to a reasonable level as the Americans have done, it should, first of all, have reduced government spending, something that was not announced by the Minister of Finance?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this has been a recurring theme in this chamber, in the other place and throughout the country by critics of the government. They say that there should be truly massive cutbacks in spending. The fact is that honourable senators on the other side of the house who have been in government are aware of the substantial lack of flexibility which makes difficult these deep spending cuts which will have the kind of effect desired by Senator Asselin.

When we talk about major cutbacks, we are talking about major cutbacks in sharing programs with the provinces, help for senior citizens and veterans, Family Allowances, medical and hospital care, aid to the unemployed, and so on. I have yet to hear one member on the opposition side stand up in his or her place and demand that there be deep cuts in those areas. When we ask for specific suggestions with respect to realizable, practical cutbacks in spending, they talk in essentially superficial terms. They say, "Why don't you cut the advertising program for Unemployment Insurance?" or, "Why don't you cut this program or that program?"—where, in effect, those cuts would have only a minimal effect on the total budget picture. These are facts which must be admitted by those on the other side who have served responsibly in government either provincially or federally. I am sure that Senator Asselin, when he was a minister of the Crown, early in his cabinet career, was apprised of the limited degree of total discretionary power over spending which exists in this country. It is a challenging situation, to say the least.

With regard to our deficits, may I suggest that one of the most refreshing and reassuring comments I have heard recently was made last week when a Canadian economist said that the Canadian dollar today is perhaps the most undervalued currency in the world, that in the long term a nation possessed of resources or hydro-electric power, coal, natural gas, energy, agriculture, lumber, fisheries, and all the rest, despite present problems, simply has to have one of the finest futures in the entire world.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Then why have you messed it up so?

Senator Perrault: When the honourable senator talks about economies being messed up, let us look at the world realistically.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: It would be a simple procedure for anyone to draw up in five minutes a long list of nations in worse economic trouble than ourselves, some with Conservative governments, others with socialist governments and others with social democratic or Liberal governments. Every country in the world is afflicted at the present time with economic difficulties, malaise, dislocation, you name it. I would like to know the name of one Minister of Finance anywhere in the world who is popular in his country today. Would the opposition like to suggest the name of a Prime Minister or government leader who is riding the crest of popular acclaim?

An Hon. Senator: Ronald Reagan of the United States.

Senator Perrault: That is not true, according to all of the surveys. Most of us have been in politics for a considerable period of time. Were we, on this side, now in opposition, we would be making certain critical statements about the government. That would be our task. But we know realistically, as Canadians, that the only way out of our problems is the solution advanced by the Minister of Finance last night, that all of us must assume a responsibility to help the nation selflessly during its time of economic difficulty and travail.

● (1425)

That calls for restraint; it calls for sacrifice; and it calls for greater productivity. These are the answers to our problems. Our problems are not going to be solved by political sloganeering; they are not going to be solved by Liberals accusing Conservatives of irresponsibility, or by Conservatives accusing Liberals of dereliction of duty, or by members of the NDP attacking the other two parties. All of us love this country and we want to help it.

We are going to do it by co-operating and working together. Despite our legitimate political differences, we are going to achieve it through solidarity; that is the real solution. We know it and you know it.

Let us talk about the deficit. The key point in the view of the government is that our deficit is increasing largely as an automatic and thus automatically reversible response to economic weakness. The suggestion advanced by certain members of the opposition—and I am not referring especially to anyone in this chamber—is that there is a profligate power-mad government which is inventing new ways to spend money every day, which has installed high-speed printing presses in the basement to crank out more money, a government unmindful of the deficit problem. Of course, the charge is ridiculous.

The concerns in the United States, since Senator Asselin has made reference to them, are centred on the fact that even when a good recovery gets under way, the U.S. deficit may continue to rise due to scheduled tax cuts and rapid growth in defence spending. Thus, in the United States, there is a prospect of upward pressure on interest rates with private borrowing demands starting to grow again.

Let us compare the deficit between Canada and the United States. Comparing the current levels of deficit is complicated. Our projected levels are now somewhat higher relative to our GNP than are the latest official U.S. forecasts relative to their GNP. This is a matter of fact of which honourable senators are aware. The U.S. administration has tended to base its fiscal forecasts on much more optimistic economic assumptions, such as interest rates and real growth, than have we.

It is also the case that savings rates are substantially higher in Canada and that other levels of government in Canada, including the CPP and the QPP, run a larger surplus than in the United States.

Thus, a given federal deficit-to-GNP ratio in Canada implies less pressure on the total supply of savings than it does in the United States of America.

An Hon. Senator: That is wishful thinking.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of Finance has supplied a memorandum for honourable senators which, in part, states that this budget forecasts the federal financial requirements equal to 4.8 per cent of GNP in 1982-83 and compares with the latest semi-official U.S. forecast of the unified budget balance, a similar concept to our so-called financial requirements for fiscal year 1982 ending in September which is equal to 3.8 per cent of the U.S. GNP.

Congress has just passed a resolution setting a target of $103.9 billion for fiscal year 1983, about 3.2 per cent of the GNP, but it has yet to take action to specify the expenditure cuts and tax increases required to meet this target. The target is itself based on economic projections which are probably overly optimistic in the view of many economists.

Senator Asselin: Following the budget announced last evening, every financial group in Canada has said that it is not satisfied. Thus, the Minister of Finance has lost credibility in this country.

In order to regain the confidence of Canadians, would it not be wise for the Minister of Finance to tender his resignation from cabinet?

Senator Perrault: The fact is that the Minister of Finance is an extremely able, conscientious Canadian who has a long and distinguished record of public service and dedication to this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray: Pretty feeble applause over there. It is far from unanimous.

Senator Perrault: It would have been a very easy thing for Mr. MacEachen to have said, "No, I do not want to be Minister of Finance." He assumed the task at the most difficult economic time for Canada in the last 40 years. This should be stated, and his sacrifice and contribution should be acknowledged.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If he resigns, it will be the greatest contribution he could make.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators well know that, as far as opposition criticism of budgets is concerned, and I am sure most members of the opposition will agree with me, you could write all the complimentary remarks that opposition members have ever said about budgets in the history of Canada on the back of a very small matchbook.

Last evening I listened to some of the comments made on television attacking the budget. In listening to them, it seemed obvious to me that at least some of them had been written in advance. But this is budget politics; and most of us understand that.

Senator Flynn: Just like you.

Senator Perrault: Can the distinguished Senator Roblin tell me of any occasion, when he was Premier of Manitoba, when the opposition NDP ever extended its heartfelt congratulations for any of his budget proposals? Of course not. He knows that budget time is the very essence of politics, both provincially and federally.

● (1430)

I have served in opposition both provincially and federally, and I know the opposition responsibility. The opposition is there to criticize. The members of the opposition in the Senate do a good job criticizing, and that is their task.

With respect to the consultative process today, I read an editorial in one of Canada's leading newspapers. In essence, it said, "Isn't it dreadful that Mr. MacEachen is going to call on the advice of a blue ribbon committee and that that committee is going to meet to consider certain taxation policies suggested by the government and make recommendations?"

What was the charge last year? The charge—untrue—was: "This is a man who never consults and will not meet with business and will not meet with the co-operatives and will not meet with the labour movement." They said, "This is a man who should be fired"—for his alleged failure to consult.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: They said he should be dismissed for failing to consult.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: As I recall, Honourable Senator Asselin levelled that accusation just a few months ago. So perhaps the minister of Finance said, "Well, perhaps the opposition has a point. Let's consult." And now they say, "Doesn't he know where he is going?" And he is being attacked for consulting.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the minister, if I may, for some information. Does the minister have in his briefing notes a short list of those taxation measures from the November budget that are still alive? In particular, I am interested in the proposed changes in capital cost allowances and the taxation of employee benefits. Will the minister say whether those measures are still alive and are being put forward by the government?

Senator Perrault: Senator Roblin asked me that question yesterday.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Let's see if we get a different answer today.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope to have a reference shortly with respect to the question Senator Murray has just asked. I shall provide that information to the honourable senator as soon as it becomes available.

A breakdown by income group of the effects of the reduction in the indexation of the exemption of personal income taxes may be available. Perhaps I will be able to reply to that question of Senator Roblin's, later this day.

Senator Marshall: Another speech!

Senator Perrault: But the list Senator Murray is asking for is to be found in last night's budget presentation.

APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY GROUP

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I apologize for having found it impossible to return to the chamber when we resumed last night. I regretted missing Senator Perrault's remarks, but having heard him this afternoon I no longer have that regret.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He was better last night.

Senator Donahoe: Senator Perrault has made several comments about the budget. I, too, have had some reflections on it, because I had the opportunity of watching the presentation of the budget on television in another place. I have several questions I should like to ask and I have put them in the form of supplementaries so that it will not seem as if I am spending too long a time asking apparently new questions. All of my questions relate to the budget; none of them has any implication with respect to anybody's personality; all of them seek information. I hope that, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate pays strict attention, at least a few of my questions will elicit some information.

My first question is: Are the proposed tax increases announced yesterday to be subjected to the same so-called blue ribbon panel as the proposed expenditures to promote investment?

● (1435)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Do you have more questions? Let us make a list of them.

Senator Donahoe: I am perfectly happy to do so, but I am only concerned that my honourable friend not do as he ordinarily does—that is, pick on something that has nothing to do with the main subject of the questions being asked, dilate upon that, and then resume his place. I was hoping that these questions I am putting would be answered seriatim so that the answers would be intelligible to everyone.

My question is a simple one, and is: Do I take it that the answer is deferred? If it is, I accept my honourable friend's answer.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of Finance has prepared a release describing the exact work of the committee. I am in the process of obtaining a copy so that I can read that to the chamber. I will have it shortly.

Senator Donahoe: We will accept that, if that is the best the leader can do.

The so-called blue ribbon panel is to consider certain measures designed to promote investment. I think everyone would agree with that. My question is: Does the Minister of Finance have any alternative to consider in the event that the blue ribbon panel rejects those suggestions which he put forward last evening?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is a hypothetical question, and, as such, I do not have an answer to it.

It is assumed that the blue ribbon panel—and I will announce the names of the members of the panel as soon as the information is provided to me—will be able to advance proposals which can be accepted by the government. The government is interested in listening to sound advice and good counsel.

I do have some information regarding the November 12 budget which may in part answer questions raised by Senator Murray. This information was provided to me by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Murray asked whether we can expect further changes to the November 12 budget, and how many of the measures in the November 12 budget still remain.

The final bill will be introduced in the fall and will incorporate the measures announced in this budget. The purpose in providing an exposure draft of the technical amendments is to give those affected, and their professional advisors, an opportunity to review the amendments. The tax law has become extremely complex, and the minister will be quite prepared to make changes where the amendment as proposed is shown to have unintended or inappropriate results.

Senator Roblin asked yesterday how many changes have been made to the November budget proposals. The Minister of Finance has said that he has not attempted a detailed count.

Hon. Lowell Murray: It would probably be wrong, in any event.

Senator Perrault: The minister states:

The more important modifications were enumerated in my December 18 statement, and the press release accompanying the draft legislation. Many of these, and a number of others reflected in the Comprehensive Ways and Means motion are probably better described as refinements rather than fundamental changes.

I could have remained inflexible and resisted change, but I chose instead to listen and respond to constructive suggestions.

There were a number of constructive suggestions made in this chamber. The minister further states:

This approach has opened me to considerable criticism, but as indicated in my document on the budget process, it is in my view the responsible way for the Minister of Finance to proceed.

To the question: "Are you prepared to admit that your budget was both misdirected and seriously flawed?—these are statements made by some honourable senators—the minister has replied:

There are admittedly a number of changes. The budget proposed major changes in the tax system. It was an ambitious project and therefore drew considerable criticism. This should not be surprising and I am not at all embarrassed by changes that are evidence of my willingness to consult, to listen and to respond to constructive suggestions. While there are changes, the major budget and taxation thrust remains unchanged.

● (1440)

An honourable senator also asked a question with regard to the November proposal to restrict interest deductions. I took the question to the minister, and he said: "I have not backed off restricted interest"—that is, the proposal to restrict interest deductions. The minister went on:

The amendments to implement this proposal were extremely complex, and I wanted a group of outside experts to review the changes and their effectiveness before proceeding further. The members of this group are

D. J. Sherbaniuk, the Director of the Canadian Tax Foundation, R. F. Lindsay, a lawyer and D. Y. Timbrell, a chartered accountant, all of whom are from Toronto and E. C. Harris, a lawyer from Halifax. I have no intention of backing off the half year depreciation proposal. The revenue implications, in excess of $1 billion for the current fiscal year, would themselves make this impractical. To back off would seriously erode the budget deficit and the major thrust of the budget. Note that even with this change significant tax incentives for investment remain, the investment tax credit, accelerated depreciation and so on.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the proposed changes, such as those affecting employee benefits, affect tens of thousands of Canadians. I am not talking about the rich; I am talking about the salesmen, the clerks of department stores, and so on. Surely, the minister can tell us whether the government intends to persist in the course announced by the Minister of Finance in November and tax those employee benefits.

Senator Perrault: I hope the honourable senator is aware of the fact that there has been a substantial clarification of the November proposals, and that many of the employee provisions which were presumed at one time to be those that would attract taxation, in fact, will not attract taxation, including the so-called travel benefits for those who work in the transportation industry. There has been a modification of that policy, and the incidence of those proposed taxes is very much lower than first anticipated. I hope the honourable senator is aware of those changes that have been made since November.

Senator Murray: I am aware of them, but that was not the question I asked.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, let it not be forgotten that I had the floor and that I yielded it when Senator Perrault expressed the wish to diverge and answer an entirely different question from his prepared text, which he did in fine style. However, I still have two or three questions I would like to ask about the budget.

If the so-called blue ribbon panel is to report by September, then it follows that legislation cannot be introduced unless Parliament is sitting, which is not probable until October. That sets the ground for my question. Does the government consider that the private sector investment climate is so healthy that Canada can well afford to go from November 1981 to October 1982 without new incentives on the books to promote investment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there are new incentives, and they blaze out from every page of this budget document.

Hon. C. William Doody: That is a great answer.

Senator Donahoe: The response of my colleague indicates the value of that answer. The minister likened this consultative process to that which he outlined in the recent green paper. We have heard a burst of oratory, though it was hardly an answer, from the Leader of the Government defending the similarity which he alleges exists between what was set out in the green paper and what was set out in the budget last night. My question is: Can the leader answer this simple question?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Donahoe: Did the green paper in fact envisage budget announcements on possible policies followed by consultations, or did it, in fact, suggest consultations to be followed by a budget? Which came first, the chicken or the egg?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure the honourable senator has studied avidly the green paper proposals. Indeed, he may have memorized them.

Senator Donahoe: I didn't have to; I heard them explained this afternoon.

Senator Perrault: I shall take the question as notice and provide an answer at a forthcoming sitting.

Senator Donahoe: On the second to last page of the budget in summing up the effect of the tax increases, the minister said, "These savings will be taken into account when we reassess the economic and fiscal situation next fall." Bearing those words in mind and considering that the government will be required to act on the recommendation, if any, of its blue ribbon panel, will the Leader of the Government tell us whether we are to expect a new budget in the fall?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not want to anticipate what the situation may be in the fall.

Senator Murray: Worse.

Senator Perrault: I think there are signs of better things to come in the future.

Senator Flynn: Thank God.

Hon. Jack Marshall: A change in government?

Senator Perrault: —in the way of economic performance. I do not wish to get into the realm of speculation; I would rather deal in the area of fact.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Right on.

Senator Perrault: The most important sign of an impending recovery is a period of sharp liquidation of inventory, such as took place in the first quarter. This relates to what may happen in the fall. Consumers are becoming better placed to take on borrowing to buy durables such as new cars to replace worn-out and energy-inefficient models. The savings are very substantial across this country. As honourable senators are aware, there is a far higher per capita saving in Canada than in the United States.

As well, the package of assistance to home-owners announced last night will free up some income and permit additional spending which will be good for the entire economy. If the honourable senator is suggesting that there may be some sort of "panic" in the fall, which will necessitate yet another budget, it is not anticipated.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What, the panic?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question arising out of an answer given to Senator Donahoe. If I understood the Leader of the Government correctly, he stated he would soon be supplying this chamber with the list of members of the so called "credibility committee". Senator Donahoe kept calling them the "blue ribbon committee", but I submit that he had his colours mixed up and that it should be the "red ribbon committee." Will either the House of Commons or the Senate have any part in approving the members of this committee?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the names of the members of the committee are in the process of being announced.

Hon. Martial Asselin: One has been chosen.

Senator Perrault: Although as of the moment appointments of that kind are not subject to Senate approval, perhaps it would be a useful process, and it could become part of the duties of the Senate of the future.

Senator Phillips: Who made the selection? Was it the Prime Minister's Office?

Senator Perrault: These appointments are made in a collegial fashion, as they were in the case of the previous Conservative Government.

Senator Asselin: We did not get a chance to make patronage appointments.

ENERGY PRICES—INFLATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. As I followed him in his second, third, or fourth speech of this afternoon, when he was dealing with what he thought were some of the causes of inflation, I thought I heard him say that one of the causes contributing to inflation was a 656 per cent increase in energy prices. If the Leader of the Government said that, then I would like to ask him: What proportion of that 656 per cent increase in energy prices will flow into the treasury of the federal government, either in the form of taxes or in the form of other income, from energy sources?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. Of course, honourable senators are aware that the funds derived from taxation on energy resources are used for purposes that are of great benefit to the public. I know that no honourable senator would oppose such allocation.

Senator Smith: I am not saying anything about whether it is good, bad or indifferent. All I asked was how much of that 656 per cent increase in the price of energy is going to the government.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—REACTION TO GILSON REPORT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is a planted question.

Hon. Jack Marshall: How many pages in the answer?

● (1450)

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators on the other side should know that at the end of June the planting season is long past. This is the harvest season, when we start reaping the benefits of the many good things that Senator Argue does.

Senator Asselin: Bravo!

Senator Buckwold: The question is not planted, but it is one in which we are all interested. I can assure honourable senators that I have not had an opportunity to discuss this question with Senator Argue, although I would have liked to.

The Crowsnest Pass rates were discussed in a report that was tabled yesterday by Dr. Gilson. Does the minister have anything to say in regard to this report and, if so, how is it being received by the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not think the Canadian Wheat Board has a particular reaction to Dr. Gilson's report. If it has, I am not aware of what that reaction might be. Dr. Gilson has made his recommendations. From a prairie grain shipper's point of view, there are many features in those recommendations that are very commendable. The revenue shortfall that Dr. Gilson would provide for the railways in 1981-82 is higher than the government's provision of $612 million. Dr. Gilson's recommendation is $644.1 million.

For this coming crop year there would be no increase in the cost of shipping grain to the producers. Payments to the railways would be phased in from 1982-83 to 1986-87 with full compensation to the railways beginning in 1986-87. The railways would receive eventually 81 per cent of the payments or of the provisions from the government, and 19 per cent would go to the railways.

Dr. Gilson has made a recommendation that the payments generally be made to the producers and not to the railways. I think that this provision has the support, obviously, of the commodity groups, of some other groups, but decisions have not been made by all the groups involved.

The report is public. It will be considered in western Canada. I believe that Mr. Pepin will be out interviewing various organizations to get their reaction, and recommendations will be made following those consultations and it is anticipated that legislation will go forward this fall.

Again, from the standpoint of the grain producers, an encouraging part of this whole recommendation is that for the distant future it is difficult to put a precise figure on it, but it would appear that the grain producers may be called upon to pay somewhat less than 50 per cent of the actual cost of moving the grain. The whole provision will be in statutory form so that for the future the grain producers should be able to look forward to a rate in relation to the real cost of moving grain that is more advantageous than the 1925 Crow rate when those rates were, in fact, designed to pay all of the costs of moving grain. There will be a gradual phasing-in of the farmers' costs. There is to be a further review after 1986.

Dr. Gilson has done a great deal of valuable work and he has obtained an important measure of agreement from farm organizations on many points. There will be further discussions and action is contemplated for this fall in Parliament.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same topic, I must say that the minister's views on Crow have suffered a remarkable evolution over the course of the last few months. In fact, one might almost call it a sea change. He now quotes with approval the recommendations made by Dr. Gilson, which certainly I do not think he would have been prepared to do a short time ago, and he left me with the impression that he was enunciating government policy with respect to some of these items. Could he tell me which of Dr. Gilson's recommendations do constitute government policy?

Senator Argue: The government announced its framework of policy in the announcement that was made by Mr. Pepin when these exercises were undertaken by Dr. Gilson, so there is framework of government policy. As to the specifics of how that framework is to be implemented, these are opinions of Dr. Gilson. I would think it would be sensible to say that where he has obtained a consensus, for example, on variable freight rates, that government policy is likely to follow, but the report is Dr. Gilson's. These are the recommendations of Dr. Gilson which, I believe, would obviously carry a good deal of weight. They are now there for discussion, for consideration and, at least in some particulars after everything is heard, will probably see some changes.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is precisely what I would expect a minister to say, and I am glad to get that confirmation. What timetable has been established for bringing this matter to some conclusion?

Senator Argue: I believe I am correct in saying that the government is looking for legislation this fall after the consultations have taken place.

THE BUDGET

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCES—SUGGESTED REFERRAL TO ADVISORY GROUP

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address the next question to the Leader of the Government because we are back on the budget again. One of the remarkable inconsistencies in the budget of November 12, 1981 was the treatment the government proposed to give capital cost allowances. On the one hand they were asking for development and growth in investment, and on the other hand they were cutting down one of the major incentives to investment in the case of capital cost allowances.

My question is: Would the government give consideration to referring that aspect of the development policy to the so-called blue ribbon committee of people who are to advise them. It seems to me it fits in quite logically with the other developmental policies that they are asking this committee to study, and it might well be advisable to get their views on incentives for capital cost allowances and report on that matter as, on the face of it, it is counterproductive to proceed with the policy that the government has at the present time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has advanced an interesting and constructive proposal, and that suggestion will be transmitted to the Minister of Finance. I have some information about the blue ribbon committee which has just been made available.

The minister in his remarks, preliminary to appointing the panel, said in his paper, which is entitled "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income", as follows:

In this paper, I am setting out tax proposals that would remove some of the distortions created by inflation. These proposals are designed to provide for a more appropriate taxation of interest income and capital gains from selected investments by individuals. They would also ease the cost of financing for new home buyers and small businesses, farmers and fishermen and increase the attractiveness of equity investments by individual Canadians. The government is committed to reducing inflation, which is essential to ensure a durable economic recovery. The measures proposed in this paper could assist the transition to lower inflation rates through reducing some of the adverse effects of inflation on the allocation of savings.

In my paper of April 1982 on the budget process, I indicated the desirability of issuing discussion papers on important tax issues and proposals. This document is the first of these papers.

Of course, this met the opposition demands that he consult more widely, and this he has done.

The issues it raises are of concern to all Canadians and as such should be discussed broadly.

To ensure that the implications of the issues raised in this paper are fully explored, I am establishing an ad hoc committee of prominent individuals from the financial, accounting and economic communities. The role of the committee will be to advise me on the practicality of these proposals and the most effective means of implementing them at an early date. The committee will be asked to report to me no later than September 30, 1982. I invite comments on the proposals by all Canadians.

Surely, honourable senators, this includes members of Parliament, whether they serve in the other place or in the Senate.

These should be sent no later than August 31, 1982. I have also asked my officials to review the proposals with provincial governments whose revenues would be directly affected by them.

The minister went on to say:

I recognize that the publication of the proposals in this paper might create uncertainty for those Canadians who are considering purchases of a home and for small businesses and farmers and fishermen making new investments in depreciable property, pending the report of the ad hoc committee and government decisions on future measures. In order that this does not cause them to delay these purchases, any legislative provision limiting qualifying property by an effective date will include purchases made after the date of issuance of this paper.

That is signed "Allan J. MacEachen."

• (1500)

Senator Roblin has suggested that the committee could well provide its advice on a number of other matters, and perhaps that proposal has real merit. I should like to bring to the attention of honourable senators the names of the members of the 12-person committee. These are, and I quote, —prominent representatives from the private sector to advise the government on proposals set out in the paper "Inflation and the Taxation of Personal Investment Income."

The President of the Montreal Stock Exchange, Pierre Lortie, will be chairman of the 12-person committee. The other members: Grant Reuber, Deputy Chairman and Deputy Chief Executive, Bank of Montreal; J.W.E. Mingo, partner, Stewart, MacKeen and Covert, Halifax; Raymond Blais, President, la Confédération des Caisses Populaires Desjardins du Québec, Lévis; Robert MacIntosh, President, The Canadian Bankers Association, Toronto; Anthony Fell, President, Dominion Securities Ames Ltd., Toronto; J.L.A. Colhoun, Chairman, National Trust Company, Toronto; Robert Brown, Senior Tax Partner, Price Waterhouse Limited, Toronto; Mervin Lahn, President and Chief Executive Officer, The Canada Trust Company, London; Balder Johnson, Chief Executive Officer, Credit Union Central, Calgary; Robert Wyman, Chairman of the Board, Pemberton Securities, Vancouver; John Helliwell, Department of Economics, University of British Columbia, Vancouver.

These are all highly respected Canadians who represent a cross-section of political views. Honourable senators may suggest other names which could be added to the committee. I am sure that the minister would be pleased to hear from you on that point.

The feature of the honourable gentleman's term as Minister of Finance has been the remarkable fact that, since the announcement of the budget in November 1981, no Minister of Finance in the history of this country has engaged in such a broadly based consultative process—one which extends from coast to coast of this country. It is to his credit that this has been done.

I have attended some of the meetings convened by the minister. The interesting point is that some of the groups with which the minister met advanced support of the proposals we find in the budget that was presented last night. This is a budget which is broadly based in the consultative process, honourable senators. I really do not think that the minister merits criticism—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No.

Senator Perrault: —for attempting to reach out to the resources of the community for ideas which may help this country.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not wish to denigrate the list of committee members in any way, because I am sure that it has been chosen as thoughtfully as possible. At first hearing, however, it seems to me that there are a number of remarkable oversights which have been made. After all, the measures that have been put before this committee have to do with small business; they have to do largely with the farming community; they have to do largely with people who are not accustomed to the routine of Bay Street. It seems to me to be quite remarkable that there appears to be no name on that list which can speak for the people who can be expected to make use of these services, if, indeed, they come about.

I would suggest that the list might be reconsidered. The name of Mr. Bulloch, the head of the small business organization in this country, certainly ought to be considered, and perhaps some leader of the farming community. Surely, as farm credit is an important part of the total government package here, a representative of that sort should be included on the list as well. It seems to me that the list is too heavily weighted in favour of the financial technicians in Toronto. Many of the names of these people are familiar to me, some are known to me personally, and I must say that I have the greatest respect for their capabilities, yet I think it advisable that the small business community and others should be represented on that committee. I leave that suggestion with my honourable friend for his consideration.

His recitation of the matters being referred to the committee makes it all the more logical, it seems to me, that the question of capital cost allowances be included for their consideration; it certainly fits right in.

I would like to ask the minister a question or two about the budget statement that was read last night. On page 2 there is a reference to the interest situation that the public treasury will face. I would like the minister to confirm for me that, for the new budgetary period, the amount of the total income received by the government which will go to pay the interest costs alone is now 27 cents of every dollar. That is my calculation of the amount of the total budget. I wonder whether the minister would be able to confirm that figure for me some time in the course of his discussions this afternoon?

I ask him also to turn to page 3 of the same document. At the top of the page is given the new budgetary deficit. The figures given here indicate that the new budgetary deficit is $19.6 billion, yet the statement goes on to say that, in addition to this, the unemployment insurance payments will add another $2 billion to our financial requirements. Why is it not correct to say, then, that the total deficit is not $19.6 billion but $21.6 billion? That $2 billion has to be found somehow, either from the general revenues of the government itself or through new taxation in the form of wage taxes imposed on the employer and the employee. Is not the real deficit, with unemployment insurance included, $21.6 billion? That is even worse than what was anticipated. Will my honourable friend look into that question?

I should also like to ask him to turn to page 5 of the budget in order to deal with the question of administered prices. At the bottom of that page, the Minister of Finance indicated that he will ask the federal agencies and the provinces to consider restriction of administered price rises, but that is a very vague statement. Does it mean that he wishes to apply the 6 per cent rule to administered prices, such as in my own province—telephone rates, hydro rates or the marketing boards in the province of Manitoba? Is that the rule that is intended there? If not, what is it? If it is a 6 per cent rule, and if it is administered in situations where there is no control over the cost structure involved, how can a corporation be held to 6 per cent without running the risk of a loss? That is a question which the Minister of Finance leaves open, to my reading of the matter, and I would like to know what the government really intends by that.

On page 7 there appears a statement about foreign investment, about which I have two points to make. Would the minister tell me the meaning of point 3 in connection with reforms of FIRA? This item says:

● (1510)

Third, small business investments will not be subject to the full review procedure except in exceptional circumstances—

As the minister will note, on the same page there is a definition of some small businesses related to numbers of employees and volume of sales, but what does the term “small business investments” mean in relation to point 3? As I read it, it means small businesses in terms of their tax treatment, not in terms of their total volume, or in terms of the number of people they employ. What is the real meaning of this expression as used by the Minister of Finance?

I would also ask for an explanation of the policy statement made on page 8 of the budget which has to do with the National Energy Program and Canadianization. The minister says:

—we do not need, and do not intend, to press the pace of Canadianization of foreign energy holdings in the years immediately ahead.

What does that mean? Does it mean that the government intends to bring in some rule or regulation? Does it mean that they intend to use moral suasion, as they did a little while ago with banks, that turned off the tap pretty effectively? Does it mean they are going to reduce the advantages of Canadianization for an interim period while they are holding this thing back? What does it mean? These are all points that I have questioned as I read through the early part of the statement. I mention them now with the hope that, since the minister is going to give us an extensive discussion of the budget in a little while, he will perhaps be good enough to answer those questions in the course of his remarks.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question asked today, with regard to which the answers are not available at this time, will be taken as notice. Answers will be provided as soon as possible, perhaps tomorrow or early next week. They are all perfectly valid questions, and the information will be provided as it becomes available.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of the Leader of the Government arising out of the list of names of the committee which he read to us a minute or two ago. I did not recognize the names of any persons representing organized labour. I wonder if there are such names on the list, and if so, how many?

Senator Perrault: This particular list does not contain the names of those associated with organized labour, that is true. An attempt has been made to draw up a list of those who work with these matters on a day-by-day basis. That does not exclude organized labour from the consultative process over the coming weeks and months, however.

BROADCAST COMMENTARY

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government regarding the budget speech. I will first have to lay some groundwork.

Last Wednesday, as reported at page 4441 of Debates of the Senate, Senator Godfrey said:

I would like to point out that if honourable senators watch the television, they will not hear much of the speech given by the Minister of Finance. They will hear from the reporters on CBC and CTV; they will hear interviews in pubs; and they will hear the views of the coal miners in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

I was not able to be here on that occasion because I was in New York attending the special session of the United Nations with my honourable colleague Senator Bird and others.

The Leader of the Government said that he watched television last night and saw a lot of interviews and heard a lot of remarks made by commentators, and so on. I was wondering if he happened to see any interviews carried out in the Granite Club or the Toronto Club, where they sip their 12-year old Scotch. There are no coal mines in Sydney, let me point out, and, as a result, not many coal miners are going to be found in the so-called pubs in Sydney. Frankly, however, I think more common sense and down-to-earth opinions would be expressed in such interviews in such pubs if they were to take place.

Can the leader tell me if there were any interviews carried out in the Granite Club or the Toronto Club last night concerning the budget?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, generally speaking, I thought the budget coverage was handled very well by the networks last night. I had no opportunity to listen to the post-budget comments from Sydney, Nova Scotia, Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, or points in between, so I really am not an expert on the point. Perhaps Senator Godfrey or other senators have more information than I.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, the reference I made was to interviews made while the Minister of Finance was speaking, which interrupted the Minister of Finance. I have no objection whatsoever to people being interviewed in pubs or anywhere else after the Minister of Finance has had his chance to have his say uninterrupted, which I understand is what happened last night. Two years ago, however, I objected to continual interruption of the broadcast of the speech of the Minister of Finance by reporters. One would think that Mike Duffy was the Minister of Finance from the way he was announcing, before members of Parliament could hear it, what was in the budget. The whole country was being told what was in it ahead of time. Then they were going on to interviews and feeding questions all the time. They were saying—and I am referring to two years ago—“Do you agree that this budget is this, that and the other thing?”

I am glad, along with others, that such a very sensible procedure was established last night, by which the Minister of Finance was allowed to have his say first. Other people could then criticize to their heart's content, like the people I had previously mentioned and the President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Senator Muir: Is the leader aware that I am fully in agreement with Senator Godfrey's statement, but only on that specific point? I would say that his choice of geographic location was poor. However, I think interviews with a coal miner in a pub in Cape Breton would be just as intelligent and make as much common sense as those with people in the Granite Club or the Toronto Club.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I did not refer to coal miners in pubs. I was taking specific instances in previous budget speeches where they did interview people in a pub, I believe in St. Catharines, and they did interview people who I thought were either steel workers or coal miners, though I did not suggest that they were speaking from a pub in Sydney. If the CBC or CTV thought they were worth interviewing, that is fine, but only after the speech was made, and not during it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he would give us an up-to-date report on the siege of Beirut, including the contents of any reply from the Israeli government to the Prime Minister's letter requesting a withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon, and also any progress in the efforts of the Canadian diplomats in Lebanon to ensure the safe evacuation of Canadian citizens from that war-torn country.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as the safety of Canadians is concerned, our embassy in Beirut is continuing to advise Canadians in Lebanon, who may be at risk in the current situation, to move to more secure areas in Lebanon, although it may be increasingly difficult to find secure areas.

The French government has arranged to evacuate some French citizens from Juniyah on a ship bound for Toulon, France. Following an offer from the French embassy in Beirut to make some space on the ship available to Canadian passport holders, our embassy had an announcement made on Voix du Liban and Radio Liban, asking any Canadians in Lebanon who wished to leave to contact the embassy.

I have no further information on the subject of Lebanon at this time.

EXCISE TAX ACT PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-112, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, June 16, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
GEORGE J. McILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[Senator Haidasz.]

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: Then, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, before this matter is disposed of, I should say that there are four other committee reports, all reporting bills without amendment. It might be more convenient if all the bills are placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day, and then, as each order is called, honourable senators can move adjournment of the debate until tomorrow.

My reason for making this suggestion is that there are five of these bills, and it is somewhat confusing to know precisely what significance each has in the total picture. One bill on which I shall be reporting a little later—Bill C-104—is rather important, and it is hoped that it can be assented to tomorrow. I make this suggestion merely for the convenience of honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators have heard Senator McIlraith's suggestion. Is leave granted for moving that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

COOPERATIVE ENERGY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-116, intituled: "An Act to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Wednesday, June 23, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
GEORGE J. McILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not quite understand why we cannot move that each bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting as each report is presented.

Does the honourable senator wish us to say, "Later this day"?

Senator McIlraith: I suggested that the bills be dealt with at a later stage when honourable senators had had an opportunity to sort out the significance of each. I made the suggestion from the point of view of convenience. The bills can be dealt with either today or tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we all wish to co-operate with Senator McIlraith. What does the honourable senator suggest that I do in connection with this bill?

Senator McIlraith: Move that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: Therefore, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PETRO-CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-101, intituled: "An Act to amend the Petro-Canada Act", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Tuesday, June 8, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
GEORGE J. MCILRAITH
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-102, intituled: "An Act to amend the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Wednesday June 9, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
GEORGE J. MCILRAITH,
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John M. Godfrey, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL DETERMINATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, June 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-104, intituled: "An Act respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Wednesday June 16, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,
GEORGE J. MCILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

He said: Honourable senators, I should mention that representatives of the Dene Nation appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and made representations concerning Bill C-104.

Your committee notes the statement made by the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, on June 28, 1982, when he appeared before the committee, that, regarding the concerns of the Dene Nation, with respect to consultation, native equity participation and affirmative action for disadvantaged groups, the appropriate vehicle for participation is, in the opinion of the minister, the Canada Oil and Gas Act—which is existing legislation.

While your committee recommends that the bill be reported without amendment, it is suggested by the committee that the regulations promulgated under this bill be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the Senate for study and recommendation, in order to create a forum for groups which consider themselves to be disadvantaged by the regulations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith, for Senator Steuart, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Acting Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee can tell me the status of Bill C-108. It was my understanding that that bill was also to go to committee for pre-study.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Bill C-108 is, as I understand it, on the Order Paper for second reading. Although I cannot foretell what the Senate will do, presumably, if and when it gets second reading, it will be referred to the committee. It has not yet been so referred.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the debate on second reading of Bill C-108 stands adjourned in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. In adjourning the debate, the Honourable Senator Flynn explained that he wanted some further information before he spoke, and that is why it stands adjourned in his name.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For clarification, I may say that the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce considered that, although they did not specifically mention Bill C-108, the terms of reference would include all the energy bills. The subject matter of Bill C-108 has not yet been considered. The fact that we are debating second reading of this bill in this chamber does not prevent the committee from studying the subject matter.

Senator Frith: No, I was not suggesting that.

Senator McIlraith: I should make it clear that that bill was partially considered yesterday under the pre-study authority of the committee, but it was not completed.

[Senator McIlraith.]

Senator Doody: Perhaps either Senator Frith or Senator McIlraith can tell me why it was not considered with the others and why it was only partially considered. Apparently, all the other bills have gone through and Bill C-108 is out in limbo somewhere.

Senator Frith: When Senator Hayden first asked for authorization to pre-study the package, there was a discussion as to whether it should include Bill C-108 and, I think, one other bill. In consultation with others, Senator Hayden decided that Bill C-108 would not be specifically referred to in the pre-study package. However, he felt he could consider it in due course because the reference used the term "and other related matters."

It is under that heading I think Senator Flynn has pointed out that the committee has had the opportunity to, or felt that it could have the power to, pre-study Bill C-108. It has, therefore, done some pre-study on this matter, but has not completed its pre-study.

As Senator Flynn has pointed out, the committee has taken the view that it has the power to make that pre-study. Therefore, the fact that it is still on the Order Paper for second reading is not impeding the committee from so doing.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall last evening regarding the use of Room 256-S by the CBC prior to or after the budget speech.

Following an inquiry, I have been informed that it has been the custom over the years for the House of Commons to provide the Railway Committee Room and for the Senate to provide Room 256-S for the use of the press prior to the budget speech and also for presentation of the main estimates, the only exception being last year's main estimates when the House of Commons provided Room 200 in the West Block.

I should like to add two further comments. First, although the press has had the use of Room 256-S in previous years, never before has such use coincided with a committee meeting. And, secondly, if the Senate no longer wishes to follow that custom, the next time there is a budget speech or the main estimates are presented, of course, we can refuse permission. We should certainly consider whether such an event will conflict with a committee meeting, as happened this year, which, in turn, gave rise to Senator Marshall's question.

NATIONAL TRAINING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Florence B. Bird moved the second reading of Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-115 will establish a national program for occupational training, and is a great improvement on the Adult Occupational Training Act of 1967.

The aim of this bill is to provide greater adaptability of labour, to reduce unemployment and to increase productivity. It proposes to do that by spending $1 billion annually—that is, $1,000 million dollars—in order to train adult Canadians in the skills they need in the workplace now, and will need in the future, during a period of extraordinary technological change.

The money will be spent in four ways: $499 million will be used for institution classroom training; $170 million will pay for industrial on-the-job training; $33 million will provide capital to update machinery and technology used for training—next year that allocation will be increased to $75 million because the need is shockingly great; and $108 million have been earmarked for special training allowances, that is, over and above the $200 million unemployment insurance training allowances.

These allowances will be paid to trainees who have lost their jobs because of technological change. If they are receiving unemployment insurance, the allowances raise their benefits from 60 per cent to 70 per cent of their former earnings. They will receive the benefits for a year instead of the present 36 weeks. If their training lasts for longer than a year, the allowances will continue as long as necessary, and they may go back and receive their unemployment insurance benefits until they run out. This is a very sound and sensible innovation.

People who have never worked are also eligible for allowances based on their status. For example, an unmarried person living at home gets about $25 per week; a person with dependants gets $90 per week, or a little more if there is a number of dependants.

Unfortunately, many provinces and municipalities have been subtracting training allowances under the present Adult Occupational Training Act from the payments to people on public assistance. In some cases, only a very small amount is topped up, which means, of course, that the allowance will not help them very much. As a result, many potential trainees are just staying at home on public assistance. There is no incentive for them to take a training course.

I presume this practice will continue if the proposed bill is approved. This is a short-sighted, unwise practice, and is particularly hard on sole-support mothers who need to learn new skills to give their children a better chance in life. There is, of course, nothing the federal government can do about it. All we can do is make the allowances available, and that is what we should and are going to do.

How many people will be affected by this bill? If the bill is passed, it is expected that a quarter of a million Canadians will receive training this year. A great many of these 250,000 trainees will be women and aboriginal people.

Honourable senators, there are a number of very serious reasons why this new National Training Program is a necessity. In recent years there has been an increasing number of jobs that require highly skilled workers. Canada, like other developed countries, is living through a second industrial evolution. Microchip computers, new industrial technology, the use of robots in factories, incredible changes in communications by way of satellites in outer space are all having a devastating effect on employment.

● (1540)

Bill C-115 is an attempt to alleviate the hard fact that Canada does not have enough highly skilled workers to fill the demand today and for the years ahead. Right now we are relying on highly skilled immigrants who have the know-how we sorely need while, at the same time, 1.2 million Canadians are unemployed. Many of those men and women could be holding down well-paid jobs, if they had the skills demanded by new technology.

As far as unemployment is concerned, we "ain't seen nuthin' yet," honourable senators, if we do not provide adequate training. Women, aboriginal people and the handicapped will suffer the most, but in the end the whole country will suffer with them.

I say that because an inquiry undertaken by the Institute for Research on Public Policy predicts that up to one million Canadian women will be unemployed by 1990, if they have not been trained in computer technology. Today women represent over 90 per cent of tellers, telephone operators and clerk-typists; automation is reducing or threatening to reduce employment in those occupations by between 30 and 40 per cent.

The report of the Task Force on Labour Market Development indicates that during the next decade the composition of the work force will change dramatically. That task force was chaired by David Dodds, who is considered to be Canada's foremost labour market economist. Dr. Dodds says there will be a significant slowdown in the growth of the labour force because of demographic as well as technological change. Of the Canadians entering the world of work, two-thirds will be adult women. There will be no way that they will be able to find the work they want and need, if they are not trained. They will need to be trained not only in computer technology but also as welders and machinists and for other jobs not as a rule entered into by women.

There will be great suffering, I am sure, if these women are not trained for the jobs Canada needs. Women can no longer rely on men to support them. One out of every three first marriages ends in divorce so that many young women must work for a living. Many women are left with young children. Already 45 per cent of women on public assistance are sole-support mothers, either single, divorced or widowed.

If we fail to train women for the workplace of today and tomorrow, the burden of public assistance and increased guaranteed income supplements will be a financial burden too heavy for any government to bear. Bill C-115 attempts to prevent that fearful eventuality.

This bill will also assist Canada's aboriginal people. They will no longer be required to have passed the provincial school-leaving age in order to qualify as adults under the program. This means that young aboriginals who have left school at an early age, as many do, can now learn a trade.

This will profoundly affect the western provinces because labour projections indicate that by 1990 native people will account for over 20 per cent of the total labour force growth on the prairies. Our aboriginal people had their baby boom later than others, so many young Indians and Métis are already moving into the labour market.

The capital funds allocated under Bill C-115 are greatly needed. The quality of much of the training has become inadequate because the provinces have not upgraded their teaching facilities. There are a number of horrible stories I find hair-raising. They involve a great waste of money and a waste of human potential and must have done much to contribute to the present decline in our gross national product.

Let me take only two examples of why capital funds are needed. In Vancouver, for years aeroplane maintenance workers have been trained on vintage World War II aeroplanes. When they have finished the course, they are sent out to maintain 747s. Obviously, they must be retrained because they are back where they started. Another shocking example is from the other side of the country. In St. John's, marine engineers and maintenance persons are being trained on equipment that is 30 or 40 years old. New, highly technical equipment for fishing boats is available, but Newfoundland trawlers are not buying it because they do not know how to run it or look after it. As a result, the manufacturer is in trouble, the trainees have a skill that is of no use to them or to anyone else, and the fishermen are carrying on with outdated equipment.

Two years ago it became evident that previous training programs had become largely inadequate and that we were facing an unemployment crisis affecting our whole economy. Obviously, a new approach was needed. A great deal of research was required before realistic recommendations could be given to the government.

That research has now been done, and done well. The parliamentary committee on employment opportunities, chaired by the Honourable Warren Allmand, spent two years travelling across the country. It heard witnesses and digested briefs from labour, industry, business management and the provinces. At the same time, the Task Force on Labour Market Development—the Dodds task force—carried on research in depth, and academic, industrial and labour experts prepared background papers and acted as consultants. All levels of society were heard from.

The reports of the Allmand committee and the task force became the basis of prolonged consultation with the provinces. In September 1981 and in January 1982 there were conferences between the federal minister, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and provincial and territorial ministers.

Agreement was finally reached by nine of the provinces and the territories, but not, alas, by Quebec, and Bill C-115 was the result. After the bill was tabled in the other place, several of the nine provinces, after studying the text, were worried about a few technical details. They appointed the Honourable Bette Stephenson, Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, to act as their representative.

She met in private with the minister and later appeared before the Standing Commons Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. Several important amendments requested by the provinces were agreed upon by both of the ministers and were presented to the committee by the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and they were accepted by the other place.

During the hearings of the committee, Dr. Stephenson, when discussing the program, said:

I have a feeling that if this were developed appropriately, the proposed National Training Act might prove to be a model upon which federal-provincial cooperation in a number of areas could be established.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, working relationships with the Quebec government have left much to be desired. In January, Quebec was not represented by a minister. In May, the Quebec government refused to meet with the federal officials about the training agreements. It also refused to accept the documents. Only at the last moment did Quebec request a meeting with the federal government and accept the documents. The agreements are still being discussed and we can still hope for the participation of Quebec.

Of course, this bill will provide many benefits for Quebec. It will enable the federal government to provide direct assistance for the retraining of workers laid off because of technological changes. This is very important for the Quebec textile industry as well as for the footwear industry. This bill will also provide for better industrial training which will promote modernization of the Quebec economy.

Honourable senators, the amendments made to this bill respond to comments made by Quebec. Co-operation must therefore be possible. This is essential for the young people, the women, the unemployed and all the people of Quebec.

[English]

Now, how will the proposed act be implemented? Honourable senators, this is a complicated but important procedure, and I will do my best to give you a broad outline.

The first step is for the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission to designate areas where there are shortages at the local, regional and national level that are serious enough to warrant special action. After consultation with the provinces, the money for training is allocated to those areas.

• (1550)

In order to designate priority, the commission is assisted by tripartite planning boards made up of people representing the federal government, the private sector of industry, and labour.

Information about training needs and job projections is supplied to these boards by a group of consultants, academics and researchers appointed by the federal government and the provinces. They are assisted by the Canadian Occupational Projection System, which bears the imposing acronym COPS. I am sure we will all remember that, even if we cannot remember the Canadian Occupational Projection System.

At present, information on the prospects for labour supply and demand is collected and analysed by a multitude of institutions in the public and private sectors. COPS is designed to integrate this information.

Manpower Needs Committees in each province feed data into the system and recommend the designation of priority occupations, thereby ensuring that the provinces are fully consulted.

Honourable senators, this is a complicated bill, but it is also an important one. I think we should pass it without delay so that the Department of Employment and Immigration gets the authority it must have to proceed with this very necessary and enlightened training program.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, first of all, I wish to thank Senator Bird for her presentation of a bill that, as she pointed out, has some complex aspects, especially in the area of manpower forecasts which includes designating what the bill refers to as occupations that have been declared to be of national importance because of serious manpower shortages in these particular sectors.

Without wishing to get into a long philosophical discussion, since Senator Bird's last remarks were my cue for commenting on this legislation, nevertheless, I should like to warn against a somewhat utopian view of things which we inherited from the first education economists in the 50's.

When conventional economists realized that because of its implications and direct association with technological change, education could be considered by societies as an investment and analyzed as such from a purely economic point of view, they introduced various concepts including the following idealized situation. According to this concept, it should be possible to establish a balance between labour market needs and the production of the education system, both qualitatively—in other words, educational content—and quantitatively—that is, the number of individuals or graduates delivered to the labour market by the system—a balance in which education would be directly related to the qualitative and quantitative needs of the labour market.

This utopian concept has been filling our minds for almost two generations. It has infiltrated organizations such as the OECD and all kinds of national planning organizations in various countries. I remember being involved in a study that had been requested by the Netherlands government and sponsored by the OECD which had assigned staff from various countries to work on a task force that was to analyze manpower requirements in the Netherlands and how that country's system of education related to its manpower needs. I remember that at the time—this was around 1967, 1968 or 1969—even economists were starting to suspect that this qualitative and quantitative balance between the production of education systems and labour market requirements was largely an illusion, for a very simple reason. As soon as we realize, and I mean realize, even if the process is as complex as that described by Senator Bird a moment ago, as soon as we realize that there is a shortage, and an order goes out either to our education system or to some kind of organization to produce the manpower, properly trained and in sufficient number, to alleviate that shortage, there is a time lag, depending on the time it takes to train for the jobs in question which may be more or less demanding, technologically or otherwise. Meanwhile, however, the situation is changing and manpower needs are changing as well.

There is this idealistic desire to do the right thing and to create the perfect situation. Of course, we can still try to reduce the lag by various means, but I wanted to point out the more philosophical view that comes across in this legislation in what may be its only truly original concept, namely, that of occupations that may be declared to be of national importance if the authorities are satisfied that there is a sufficiently serious national or regional shortage—both possibilities are indicated in the clause that defines this concept—a sufficiently serious shortage to justify special action.

If there is a shortage in an occupation that requires only a few months of training, the lag I referred to will not be as important. But in fact, those occupations are usually not very demanding.

If, however, the shortage concerns an occupation which demands very high qualifications, the lag may be quite considerable, and then the problem arises which I pointed out earlier. Again, these are just a few considerations to provide a background, as it were, for comments I shall be making that will relate more directly to the legislation itself.

Perhaps we should ask ourselves first of all, is there anything new in this bill? It is not my intention to criticize Senator Bird for pointing out the amounts involved in implementing the legislation, since I imagine the figures were transmitted to her by the department—I am referring to the billion or so dollars. However, this amount, which has been linked to the legislation being considered today, also contains "old money", to the extent that this bill is intended to supersede the Adult Occupational Training Act. I do not have the figures in front of me, but I think that even without the new legislation, and merely to maintain the present Act—I would appreciate it if Senator Bird, in her speech at the end of the debate on second reading, would provide this information—I am sure at least one billion is involved, and that there is not that much new money in the new bill. There may be some new figures as a result of changes in allowance levels. Unless I am mistaken, there may be a vote of a few hundred million dollars for investment in accommodation or equipment for occupations of national importance, but since I have no documentation on the subject, I cannot give exact figures. That is why I would ask Senator Bird to provide this information so that we will understand that in passing this bill, only a marginal amount, whose extent should be established, is involved and not the billion dollars referred to.

● (1600)

If this legislation repeals the old Act, of course the entire amount referred to is involved. However, we must assume that the old Act is not being repealed, for the sake of making an accurate comparison.

That being said, and also to discover what is new in this new legislation, I feel that it would be useful to recall the situation in which the present Act, the Adult Occupational Training Act, was passed in 1967. I am sure our Speaker will remember, since at the time, he played a leading role in preparing the 1967 legislation.

In 1967, we had a situation which started many years earlier when the federal government contributed to the financing of occupational training in co-operation with the provinces. The federal contribution was in the form of cost-sharing and varied depending on the program, sometimes 50 per cent, sometimes 75 per cent. In any case, the federal government had been making a financial contribution to occupational training for a number of years, since the 30's, and we can even go back as far as the first Act that was passed for agricultural training, I think at the beginning of this century.

So, the situation with respect to occupational training was as I just described it, and most of the training being financed was at the secondary level, and, to a lesser extent, in technical schools. The secondary level was represented by trade schools or apprenticeship centres. In fact, the second problem at the time—the federal government helped to finance university education on a per capita basis according to population and on the basis of a fiscal transfer which was one and a fraction of a point, if I am not mistaken. In any case, there were cash payments which closed the gap between the fiscal transfer funds and the per capita amount which corresponded to a given amount that varied from time to time, starting at 50 cents per inhabitant and going as high as several dollars starting in 1967, if I remember correctly.

A number of questions were asked about the ambiguous situation that might arise as a result of the federal government financing occupational training at the secondary level.

To clear up this ambiguity, at a federal-provincial conference in the fall of 1966, the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, proposed a two-tiered plan: the federal government would withdraw from institutional financing until the end of the secondary level and would redirect financial assistance to educational institutions in the provinces to the post-secondary level. Therefore, as far as institutional financing was concerned, the federal government was withdrawing from all areas of education at the secondary level and was concentrating on post-secondary education, because by that time, as a result of expanding school attendance up to the university level, the need for financing had shifted to the post-secondary level.

However, after the government had withdrawn from financing institutions dispensing occupational training, it decided to finance their clientele, in other words, individuals who would have special needs once they were on the labour market, that is, once they had left the regular school system. The government then devised a plan under which, instead of financing institutions, it would purchase courses in regular institutions for individuals designated by the manpower centres, while another possibility was to purchase places on courses that could be set up in co-operation with industry, and so forth.

I am mentioning these facts because in the legislation we are considering today, the newest concept is that once certain occupations are declared to be of national importance, the bill provides for financial assistance for the establishment of new institutions or the conversion of existing facilities or equipment. This is an entirely new concept, compared with the policies of Mr. Pearson. That is to say, the Pearson government had withdrawn from institutional financing, opting instead for the financing of clientele. This legislation involves the federal government once again in institutional financing. However, the problem is not a major one if there is no "new" money to speak of. But if there is a substantial amount of new money, the problem may become a serious one.

In this context, the information I requested earlier is indeed very important. If $500 million are being spent on new investment, the problem is a serious one. If it is just a matter of $100 million across Canada, it is just window-dressing, because we know what it costs nowadays to build a school or set up occupational training courses, especially when heavy equipment is required. That is one of the things the legislation wants to do, namely, convert equipment for training requirements and that costs a pretty penny. Consequently, if $100 or $200 million are involved, it is window-dressing, but if it is $500 or $600 million, that is a different thing altogether and it means reverting to the situation that existed previous to the policy introduced by the Pearson government.

As far as the rest of the bill is concerned, there is nothing really new. It is a continuation of the present course purchase program and once the investments I referred to have been made, the procedure will be to purchase places in these new institutions.

● (1610)

The allowance system is maintained but has been made more generous for certain groups. Therefore, in essence, I do not see anything new except for the aspect I have just commented on.

New or not, in its initial version, the bill raised problems of principle. I would like to give a few examples. For instance, in the original version, Section 4.4 is included in the part entitled "Enrolment". It deals with the enrolment by a representative of the Department of Manpower and Immigration of an adult in a given course. This is what we find:

No officer may, pursuant to subsection (1), arrange for the enrolment of an adult in a course given in a province by an organization, other than a public authority, unless the organization has been registered, licensed or otherwise authorized by the government of the province to give courses.

In the first version, the one introduced at the first reading stages the clause stopped there. Once the organization, a private institution, had been recognized by the province pursuant to the system applicable in the province of certification—and the system varies from province to province—once the organization had been officially recognized by the province, the manpower centre could have purchased places in any course. The provinces would have become involved in the process only when the organization was authorized or recognized, which might have been acceptable 25 or 50 years ago in certain schools. In my opinion, the new version is a significant improvement over the first version in this regard.

No officer may, pursuant to subsection (1), arrange for the enrolment of an adult in a course given in a province by an organization, other than a public authority, if—

Follows the first condition, which is the same as what I have just read in the original version. However, there is a second requirement:

—the government of the province has been notified, pursuant to subsection (5), in respect of the course and disapproves of the course.

In such a case, there will be no enrolment.

This gives the province a right of veto over enrolment. In my opinion, this is an improvement in view of the fact that the provinces have an obvious priority as concerns educational matters under the Constitution. I use the word "priority" but I should say "exclusive jurisdiction", according to an interpretation which goes back many generations. Subsection 5 provides a mechanism for the provinces to exercise their right of veto. I emphasize there is a major change there. It eliminates a question of principle that might have been raised.

I will give a further example. Am I taking too much time, Mr. Leader?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No. It is not your speech, but other commitments.

Senator Tremblay: Clause 12 deals with the joint committee. The initial version had this to say on first reading:

The Commission may establish with the government of a province a joint committee to assess the requirements of the labour market for skilled workers and the means necessary to meet such requirements.

It must be recognized that there was not much constraint there. In the new version now before us, it is provided that:

The Commission shall invite the government of a province to cooperate in the establishment—

This is a clear obligation. Each province shall be invited to establish that joint committee. Also, I note that the joint committee is given responsibilities or a specific role. This will also be found in the declaration of occupations of national importance, Clause 2.3. Such was not the case before.

To that extent, I am in complete agreement with Senator Bird when she emphasized that with the amendments brought in between first and third reading in the other place, the government or minister put in amendments that substantially change the course of federal-provincial relations by giving provinces a much clearer assurance of a determining part in the process of change. This I emphasize, and I commend the authors for this, because to me this is something of a basic nature.

• (1620)

This being said, it remains however that I am somewhat dissatisfied with some other aspects of the bill which are perhaps of lesser importance, except one which I will mention later.

The new title, for example, is as follows: "An Act to establish a national program for occupational training." The previous legislation was entitled: "Adult Occupational Training Act." The term "occupational training" has a very broad meaning here. They did not even mention that adult occupational training is involved. But apparently it is a national program. When you go to the bottom of things, you realize that this program is no more and no less national than the previous one. As in the previous program, the training is for adults. Why not call it "adult occupational training", a term already in use and which did not give rise, thanks perhaps to the passage of time, to any special response from the provinces, at least some of them? It is as though they deliberately would not let sleeping dogs lie. They seem bent on chicanery. But they either want to imply something new with the new terminology, or they do not. I feel that they imply nothing new. I feel that this is outright provocation.

The same remark would apply also to Clause 3 which deals with the purpose of the bill. It states:

The purpose of this Act is to establish a national program to provide occupational training . . .

The real purpose is of course to promote by means of a national program. As I have just said, such a national program already exists. There is nothing new there. Again, this is pure chicanery. I feel that this is unwarranted provocation, for they could have used the existing title. Some might object that a new act required a new title.

I will borrow an example from the Constitutional area. People say, for instance, "the Constitution Act of 1982" or "the Constitution Act of 1867". That is their title. All our pieces of legislation dealing with the Constitution have the same title, except for the year. The content is not even identified. There might be a technical problem there. If such were the case, that would be pointless. But under these circumstances, I suggest that the reaction of a number of provinces might just have been provoked.

I am somewhat concerned by the definition of the word "adult". It may not be absolutely fundamental. I think that this point has been raised by various provinces. According to the definition, an adult is a person who is not required by law to attend school in the province in which he resides. That is a new version. The original version was amended and some progress has been made. At first, the section read "who is not required by law". The difference may be subtle but still an effort has been made and I want to mention it.

Then we get to section 4 concerning enrolment. Following a stipulation that there has to be a period of twelve consecutive months between the end of mandatory attendance and the time when enrolment may take place, section 4(2) states that the commission may waive that condition if it is deemed appropriate, for instance if staff requirements in a given occupation so dictate.

I know and the committee was aware that the provinces have asked that their agreement be sought when the general rule is no longer applied. That may not be a major issue but, just the same, it would be more respectful of the position of the provinces in the field of education.

And then there is section 4(3) where the commission may refer to an organization if it is less costly, I mean enrol an adult in a private organization rather than in the regular or public system. Someone pointed out that such a provision would prompt throat cutting in the deliberations of the joint committee. I agree. I have been on one of those joint committees, and it is true that all this has to go through the joint committee. I can imagine the Commission's representatives saying: In this private institution, it costs us $5 less than what you are charging us for enrolment in a public or government institution. The province then answers: No, the real difference is $4.25, and so forth. I think we are almost asking for trouble here. On the other hand, the federal government has been in similar situations before and it seemed to be able to cope. We can only hope that checks on enrolment will not prevent the federal government from resolving its problems in this area.

Another potential cause for concern may be found in clause 9(4) dealing with public notice. Clause 9(4) has been substantially improved, as we said earlier, just as one of the other preceding clauses.

No agreement for the purchase or erection of a building shall be entered into if, during the forty day period following the day on which public notice was given pursuant to subsection (3), the government of the province in which the building is or is to be situated notifies the Commission in writing of its objection to the agreement.

So, there is a veto. As to the principle, there is no problem and this is a real improvement. But what does public notice have to do with it, since it is up to the joint committee to decide? If the Commission publicly announces its intention of purchasing or acting as provided under clause 9, is it with the intent to put pressure on the provincial government concerned? Is this procedure supposed to put the province in an embarrassing position where it has to say: No, we will not go along with this project? Will public notice be given before, during or after the joint committee? There is something that bothers me here.

I have just mentioned a number of points whose importance I would not wish to exaggerate, in the circumstances. Consequently, I am not making an issue of this nor am I proposing amendments I think would be necessary.

On the other hand, there is clause 8(4). In this case, I feel that for the sake of consistency in the amendments made after first reading, instead of just a consultation, a veto or approval would logically be required on the part of the provinces. That being said, I may say I intend to propose an amendment whose significance should be clear at this point. I shall elaborate further upon tabling the amendment. This could be done either in committee, if the bill is referred to committee after second reading or it could be done here in the Senate at the third reading stage, if the Senate does not refer the bill to committee again. As for the general principle of this bill, considering the amendments made between first and third reading in the House of Commons, I do not intend to oppose the bill on second reading, but I do intend to present the amendment I referred to just now.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make on the subject of this bill, a measure that will be of particular interest and value to many Canadians. It has been described as one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before Parliament. The Honourable David Crombie, in the other place, said:

—this is not simply a minor event which is occurring during the longest session of Parliament's history. I have reviewed all the legislation which we have dealt with in the House, including the budget statement, the National Energy Program and the Constitution debate. If I had to choose a piece of legislation which will or ought to have a greater impact on Canadians in the next 20 years, it is this piece of legislation.

He went on to say:

—the name Axworthy will be right up there with the names of those people who piloted the bills through in 1910, in 1942, 1960 and 1967, and that will be well deserved.

So it is an important bill, recognized by members of the opposition, many of whom have made a constructive contribution to the parliamentary debate.

With the passage of this bill, Canada will have a truly national training program which, despite our current economic problems, will boost economic development throughout the country at a time when we surely need it. There can be no hesitation in saying that this is one of the most significant pieces of legislation to come before us in this or any other session in recent memory. Senator Bird gave an excellent dissertation on the salient points of the new legislation. Senator Tremblay made a valuable contribution to the debate just a few moments ago.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: For my part, I would like to confine my remarks to how the new training program will benefit those in small business, many of whom are suffering a great deal under current economic conditions.

Many of us in this chamber can identify with the problems of the small entrepreneur. We all have vivid memories, I think, of days when governments at all levels seemed more inclined to throw obstacles in their path rather than look for ways to help the small businessman. Small businesses are the economic backbone of this country and it is encouraging, indeed, to see that the Minister of Employment and Immigration had the foresight to recognize that by ensuring significant improvements to the training program that would be of particular interest to employers in the small business sector.

In the past, many small business people did not train staff because there was not sufficient inducement to do so. Training is both expensive and time-consuming and the benefits are not always apparent to someone preoccupied with meeting a weekly payroll. Training is a serious commitment, and employers must be convinced that it is worth the effort and the expense. I think we can be optimistic that the new training program will win many converts from among the small business community.

Under the new legislation, authority is provided for the government to negotiate industrial training contracts with persons or groups other than employers and groups of employers. This will greatly increase training opportunities for employers and their workers by making available to them the expertise provided by industrial training councils, private training organizations and consultants who specialize in training programs tailored to the needs of industry. This provision will be of prime importance to small employers who at the present time are not able to provide training in the more complex organizational skills.

For example, small high tech firms in an area might each want to train several workers, but individually would lack the instructional capacity to do so. However, a consortium of employers could provide that capacity and train many other workers as well.

Under this new act it will be possible to draw up a contract to allow such a consortium to provide training according to a schedule agreed to by the employers involved.

Another significant change is that for the first time employers will be able to arrange for training outside Canada supported by federal assistance. Although the minister has suggested that this provision will be used sparingly, there will be occasions—such as the start-up of new plants or production involving new technology not yet available in Canada—where it will make eminent sense to help Canadian workers to receive advanced training at the locations where the technologies have been developed. Undoubtedly, this will assure the flexibility required to give Canadians the opportunities to obtain key jobs created by these technological advances.

Finally, honourable senators, the minister will have, I think, the eternal gratitude of every small business person in this country—indeed, Parliament will have that gratitude—for his and Parliament's efforts to reduce the paper burden imposed on them by government. I refer to the fact that the new legislation has provisions to simplify the administrative arrangements with employers which will free them from keeping stacks of detailed records of training expenses. We all know the small business people in our communities who at times feel almost overwhelmed with the forms they are required to fill in and the paper burden. There is no doubt that the composite single rate basis under which employers will be paid a single amount per training day for their trainees will simplify the administrative arrangements, and reduce costs for both employers and the government.

Surely that is of importance to all concerned, but particularly to the small employer who is presently required to devote considerable time to maintaining detailed cost records for training contracts involving only one or two employees and very modest training expenditures.

Honourable senators, many will be served well by Bill C-115 when it is enacted into law. It will assure well deserved help for the small employer.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Bird speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, I should like to answer more specifically certain of Senator Tremblay's questions.

Of the new money, we do not know how much will be spent for allowances, but a considerable amount will be spent on a great many things that are very much needed, and in that respect we are going far ahead of the previous measure. The money allocated under the old measure was about $850 million; under Bill C-115 the money will amount to about $1.13 billion. I should point out that we had put aside $108 million to spend on capital expenditures during the next 18 months, but we will not be able to use that important money because we lack the legislative authority. That is why the bill is important to us.

I appreciate Senator Tremblay's remarks about minor details such as titles, and the odd word here and there. He knows as well as I do—and he is far more experienced than I am in this respect—that there is no bill in the world which all of us could agree to in every single aspect or in every single, solitary word. All we can do is produce a bill which, as nearly as possible, makes everyone happy. Personally, I think this bill goes a long way towards doing that.

If we were to pick on every single word, we would be here forever, and we would never get any legislation through either this house or the other house. I am sure Senator Tremblay knows that from his experience, and I am sure that is why he will not put difficulties in the way of passing this bill.

I do not quite understand why he feels we need to have an amendment, but, of course, that is another matter. In any event, I think the subject has been covered quite ably by Senator Perrault. I assume that no questions have been left unanswered; otherwise I am sure honourable senators would have asked them. On that basis, honourable senators, I move that the bill be read the second time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Florence B. Bird moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stollery, seconded by the Honourable Senator Anderson, for the second reading of the Bill C-108, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3)".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have discussed this matter with Senator McIlraith. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will be considering Bill C-108 next Tuesday. It is my intention, therefore, to speak to the matter on Monday night so that it can be referred to committee for consideration on Tuesday next. With that in mind, I ask that this order stand.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-112, to amend the statute law relating to certain taxes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not wish to detain the Senate on this bill, but perhaps I should say a word or two that might relate not only to Bill C-112 but to the other energy bills we have before us. In that way, I might spare the Senate several speeches on the same topic.

[Senator Bird.]

I do not intend to go into any great detail, but I should like to make it clear that there are certain aspects of this bill, as with the other energy bills, that I find difficult to accept with any enthusiasm.

The theme that runs through all this legislation—

Senator Frith: You just have to accept them; you do not have to be enthusiastic about them.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to vote for them. That is the extent of my disapproval.

Senator Frith: I just wanted to make that opportunity available to you.

Senator Roblin: Then I am glad that my honourable friend made his point clear.

These bills are based on the principle that the government should make all the subordinate law through regulation and other executive acts. It seems to me that it has gone beyond any actual need to do so in drafting this legislation.

I regret that the recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments of September 1980, and which covered the whole of this field, have not been adhered to with any great faithfulness in the drafting of this legislation. So, it seems to me that we are simply allowing Parliament to abdicate a good deal of its responsibility by allowing the executive to create the real law by which these bills are administered, and I do not like that.

With this legislation, I feel that we have an unexampled instance of taxation by Governor in Council and not taxation by the legislature.

In Bill C-112, the one before us now, there are powers granted to the Governor in Council to impose taxation on the people of Canada which amounts to billions of dollars over the years. The ceiling, it is true, is set by the bill, but under that ceiling the Governor in Council has large powers to tax the people of this country in a way which seems to me is the prerogative of Parliament.

The Incremental Oil Revenue Tax and the Natural Gas and Gas Liquids Tax to raise some $7 or $8 billion over the course of the agreement between the provinces and the federal government on energy are entirely at the discretion of the Governor in Council. I find that to be offensive, and I have no intention of supporting such a delegation of power to the executive.

We had lengthy discussions at the committee stage regarding the right of appeal. I do not intend to repeat the arguments raised in respect of that, but I am hopeful that we will be able to persuade the minister before we are through to include a more liberal right of appeal—and I use that adjective advisedly—in some of the bills which deal with the energy question than the one there now, because when one is dealing with the rights of a citizen—and the minister is involved in what seem to me to be judicial or quasi-judicial decisions—the right of appeal should be free and open and should not be hedged around by qualifying weasel words.

Senator Godfrey made it amply clear at the committee stage that that is the case with a great deal of this legislation. Weasel words hedge around the right of a minister to do as he damn well pleases. I think the committee will support me in saying that this need not be and should not be. So, I also feel that that aspect of this legislation is unsatisfactory.

Honourable senators, the committee has given careful consideration to these bills. While they are reported without amendment, that does not mean that all the members of the committee agreed that that should be the case. Some of us were willing to consider radical amendments to this legislation, but we found that that was not the view of the committee as a whole and they could not be made.

I must say one thing, however. When the minister appeared yesterday he did make concessions of a kind to the arguments that the committee had been presenting that indicated a more serious consideration of our views than we have had on all the legislation before us in the last little while. So, while we are relying mostly on ministerial undertakings, I think they are good and sufficient undertakings.

It would be churlish not to mention that the minister has taken a few steps in our direction in trying to restructure the legislation, perhaps by amendments at a later date, that will more clearly fit our view of what is right and proper in these bills.

However, I come back to my main point, that the structure of the bills is deplorable, and that the delegation of such great power to the executive is unnecessary, and unwise. That does not mean that I do not recognize the need for power of regulation by government. I recognize that, but that is not sufficiently defined and not carefully enough set out to suit me. It seems to me to be designed for the convenience of the administration rather than for respect of the rights of Parliament.

I say that with some regret, but it is conclusion I am forced to arrive at. I refer again to the powers of the Governor in Council to tax the Canadian people to the tune of billions of dollars over the next five years on their own say-so, and say that is not a method of business I find appealing.

So, I come to the conclusion, speaking for myself, that I cannot support this bill, nor do I intend to support any of the others, except Bill C-116. I should like honourable senators to take what I have said as read in respect of each one of the six bills before them. I promise not to reiterate my views, on them.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that some of the considerations raised by Senator Roblin were dealt with by the minister, according to the statement I read, and he has said that himself with regard to some aspects, but obviously not enough to satisfy him.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. John M. Godfrey, moved the third reading of Bill C-102, to amend the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL CANADIAN OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL DETERMINATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. D. G. Steuart moved the third reading of Bill C-104, respecting petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control determination and to amend the Foreign Investment Review Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with regard to this bill, I would simply like to point out that the Minister of Finance decided yesterday to de-emphasize the canadianization of the oil industry and foreign investment control with which this bill deals.

At the third reading stage of this bill, I believe that we could review what I could describe as a gigantic failure, namely the energy policy, which, back in power, the government tried to implement to save face in view of the promises made by the Liberal party during the 1980 election.

However, there is no need to do so since this has been done several times already and we shall have the opportunity to examine this whole issue when we consider the legislation which will be introduced to implement the budget proposals of last evening and even those of November 1981, at least those which are still left.

I simply want to mention that this program, especially with regard to the subsidies provided in Bill C-104, which aims at canadianizing the oil industry, is now perceived with much less enthusiasm by the Minister of Finance. In addition, Minister Gray has also had to retreat from his position which was to give FIRA more authority. In fact, as we all know, the government has backed down in this regard. We shall have the opportunity to speak on this at some other time, but I am not going to let this bill pass on division without stating that we are not fools and we know the Minister of Finance backed down last evening.

[English]

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on third reading of Bill C-104. I had not realized that we were going to deal with these bills so rapidly, and I must say that I am somewhat unprepared.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have been at it for six months.

Senator Bell: Whether it has been six months or six years, I can never accept that it is good policy or the right thing to do to make a new class of corporate welfare bums by these grants to oil companies. What is wrong with introducing a proper tax incentive to promote the development of this industry, which is probably one of the most important segments of the Canadian economy right now? Why should the Canadian public, the little guy, have to dig into his pocket to pay for this cash incentive? For this is what we are doing with these petroleum incentive grants, and I have not read or heard anything to change my mind. At one time, this country had a good free-enterprise system when tax incentives were tied to profits. Now we are asking the taxpayers of Canada to make cash grants. I very much oppose the principle we are following in Bill C-104.

The other thing I feel very strongly about is that once companies accept these cash incentives they are putting themselves in thrall to the government. No longer will they be free to make their own decisions with regard to exploration or whatever. The freedom to make decisions is probably more important in the petroleum industry than in any other industry. It is an industry that relies on sensitive, diverse, competitive, high risk decisions. We are giving these companies the means to, perhaps greedily, take advantage of cash incentives which alone amount to a clumsy intrusion into this industry. All these factors infringe on the independence of this industry at a time when it needs the freedom to make sensitive, diverse and competitive decisions.

Honourable senators, for those reasons I oppose this bill.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Steuart speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for third reading of this bill.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the contrary, since it is third reading, any honourable senator can speak after Senator Steuart. I just want to warn him of that.

Senator Steuart: Nobody ever wants to speak when I speak.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the point of order, my understanding is that Senator Steuart moved third reading. At that time he can make any contribution he wants. However, he has missed his opportunity to speak. Also, he has no right of reply on third reading. That rule applies only on second reading. So I maintain that Senator Steuart has exhausted his right to speak. It is not that I am reluctant to hear him, because what he has to say is usually pretty good stuff.

Senator Steuart: Always. Honourable senators, I am used to the Saskatchewan Legislature, and thought I could close the debate on third reading. However, if I cannot, then that is fine.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is no question that the mover of third reading does not close the debate by speaking. The rules specifically state that it is on second reading that the mover closes the debate when replying. However, in moving third reading, I think Senator Steuart has the right to speak on the bill at least once.

Senator Roblin: He was given the chance to speak when he moved third reading.

Senator Flynn: Let him go ahead, with special permission.

Senator Frith: On that point I would have to say, "On division".

Senator Steuart: If the ruling is that I cannot speak, then I am happy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Steuart merely moved third reading, and in that light I think he is allowed to speak.

Senator Flynn: There is no need for a ruling.

Senator Roblin: Please don't make a ruling; just let him speak.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, with leave, may I speak?

An Hon. Senator: Go ahead.

Senator Steuart: What I have to say is not really that important. However, I would like to say a word or two on this bill.

This bill has been referred to as a fiasco. There is no question that with the drop in the demand for and the price of oil, the Canadianization program has run into some difficulty. I am aware of no sector that did not think that prices would continue to climb, including the government, the oil industry, the banks and other financial institutions. Nor am I aware of the Conservative Party speaking out strongly against the Canadianization program or the attempt by the government to gain more control of the energy industry, particularly the oil industry. I think that was something with which most Canadians agreed. However, with the price dropping and with the value of the dollar dropping, it was a wise move that the government announced last night. I think it wise that the government back off investing more money. I think it is a wise government that knows when to back off.

• (1700)

Senator Flynn: It should have known that a long time ago.

Senator Steuart: Some governments might have remained in power longer had they known when to back off. The last government should have backed off when it brought its budget in; it might still be the government. Some days I wish it still was the government!

I would like to point out, honourable senators, that these companies do not get any money until they risk money. The must risk money in the course of exploration and development before they save any money. They are not getting any hand-outs from the government. Anyone who knows about the exploration for and development of oil on Canada lands—which this bill encourages far more than it encourages exploration and development in the three western provinces or in the conventional oil fields—knows that it is a highly risky enterprise. In fact, the Beaufort Sea and even the offshore have yet to bring in any oil. I reiterate that it is an extremely risky enterprise, a fact which we have recognized in the past with the depletion and super-depletion measures. At present we are still encouraging all companies, including foreign companies, to invest in the development of our energy resources in the Canada lands and in the frontier, but we are giving extra incentives to Canadian companies. I think that is a sound way to proceed.

There is no question but that, with the drop in price, the Canadianization of our oil industry has run into some difficulty and has had some effect upon the Canadian dollar. I think, however, that this will pass. I think that there is no question in anyone's mind but that the price of oil will rise once again and that the demand for oil will increase. When that happens, I think that a great many of the difficulties now faced by the oil industry—including that part of the oil industry that is owned by the Canadian government and by those who have been encouraged to invest their money through programs like this one—will pass and they will find that the investment was a wise one.

Therefore, while there is a great deal with which I do not agree in the energy package, this is one part of it that I do agree with. I think that when we look back on this, that when we are out of the difficulties—and we will get out of them—people will say that this was a wise piece of legislation and a wise way to proceed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATION TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 22, debate on the motion of Senator Croll:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, when I asked, the other day, that the order be stood, I did not do so through any dilatory intent or negative motivation. I was impressed by the remarks of my colleague, Senator Asselin, whom I have known for a long time to be a sincere and well-informed internationalist. I thought that he added a dimension to the motion and, indeed, to the discussion, which was worth reflecting upon. Needless to say, it would be extremely difficult to quarrel with the motive of the motion, even if it were my intention to do so. I think it is an excellent one. It might be feasible, on such occasions, to find some informal means of discussion between the two houses and across the aisle of this chamber. However, I do not carp or cavil over that.

There are fine sentiments expressed by the motion. One is moved to express, as we must, grief at the loss of life and the injuries suffered on both sides of this conflict. These are difficult times, honourable senators. I am sure that we all watched with sadness that seemingly far away conflict and joined, in spirit, with the earnest appeals for peace which were made to both countries by His Holiness the Pope. Despite his visits, that little war continued, and before it was really over a far greater conflict opened up in Lebanon.

Even those of us who are most optimistic have to agree that the new heaven and the new earth are indeed a long way off, and that war has not been banished from the domain of men. We have a great deal to do, honourable senators. This resolution is profoundly correct in that there is nothing so stirring and so important as the tragic loss of so many young people on both sides of such a conflict.

Honourable senators, I am not one who cares for war. I am not a military man—I would make a very poor soldier, I am sure—nor am I one who is automatically enamoured of the British. No one whose ancestors were shipped out in prison ships from Scotland many years ago would automatically assume that the House of Hanover was the best group that ever came down the pike. Having said that, however, it would be difficult to think of any other victors who conducted themselves with more restraint than the British did in this conflict.

In a lustier day we might think of the British and quote Shakespeare thus:

Lay on, Macduff;

And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold enough!"

In this more civilized age, however, and because as we get older we may become a little timid, I think more readily of Polonius' advice:

Beware

Of entrance to a quarrel; but, being in,

Bear't that th' opposed may beware of thee.

I think that the British lived up to that advice, but in doing so conducted themselves with great skill and bravery. Perhaps that demonstrates the value of a professional, highly trained military force. More than that, however, I believe it demonstrates that the military should not be employed as mean agents of the state, curtailing the liberties of citizens, but ought, rather, to engage themselves in the fine art of war. The British demonstrated their skill.

I think we can all rejoice in the fact that the conflict is over. As Senator Asselin has pointed out, the problems have not been washed away, nor have the difficulties been completely effaced. Insofar as peace has descended upon that far-off land, and insofar as our British friends have conducted themselves with strength and with restraint, I think that we should remember that we have no reason to hate the people of Argentina, nor should we think that the doors between our two countries are closed forever. In fact, they should not be closed at all.

Therefore, I think that, in the spirit of this resolution, we can look forward to better days, at least in this area, and can be happy that the loss of life is at an end.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC, FISCAL AND ENERGY POLICIES OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the Senate of Canada do urge the Federal Government to re-direct its economic, fiscal and energy policies, and bring forward as soon as possible a new budget; such budget to provide proper economic direction, improved employment opportunities and measures to restore national confidence in the economy.—(Honourable Senator Charbonneau).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Charbonneau and is the item on which the Leader of the Government in the Senate has undertaken to make an intervention this week.

● (1710)

It seems we shall be here next week. I do not know whether or not there is any need for him to participate in the debate this week. That is up to him, of course. I am wondering whether Senator Charbonneau wishes to proceed before the Leader of the Government makes his intervention, or whether he would yield to the Leader of the Government if Senator Perrault wishes to proceed tomorrow. In the meantime, I suggest that it continue to stand in Senator Charbonneau's name.

Order stands.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

THE SENATE

DEBATING PROCEDURE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the house, a point of order was raised during third reading of Bill C-104. Senator Roblin has been good enough to refer me to the basis on which he holds the opinion that simply moving a motion for third reading constitutes an intervention and therefore precludes the mover from saying anything further. The citation appears in Beauchesne at page 100, paragraph 305(4), which says:

If a Member, who moves an Order of the Day, should rise and say only a word or two, for instance, "I move the order", he is precluded from again addressing the House except if the Order of the Day be a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill, in which case he will be allowed a reply.

The difficulty, it seems to me, is that if we interpret that citation strictly, it means that on second reading, when someone stands and says, "I move second reading" and then sits down and waits for the motion to be put, he cannot speak again.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, no.

Senator Frith: To clarify this point, it seems to me that on third reading he should say, "I move third reading of the bill," then sit down for the motion to be put, and, when the motion is put the procedure is the same as for second reading, except that there is no right of reply.

Senator Flynn: On second reading, the mover is entitled to speak and is entitled to reply at the end of the debate; whereas on third reading he speaks only once. If he moves the motion and does not speak at that time, he is presumed not to have anything to say.

Senator Frith: The problem with that is that he has to move the motion, just as on second reading. I suggest that honourable senators should read the citation again.

Senator Flynn: It is quite clear.

Senator Frith: I suggest it is not quite clear. The citation says that the exception to the rule is that on second reading the mover will have the right of reply. It does not say that he has the right to speak. The same rule should apply. It seems to me that the person who moves third reading says, "I move third reading" and then sits down. At that point he should be able to make some comments.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is the most obvious thing in the world. That is what the rule means. My honourable friend is creating something where nothing exists.

Senator Frith: I suggest it is just the opposite. The point is that the very fact of moving the motion does not preclude him from speaking, except after the motion has been put, and that is all.

Senator Flynn: That's okay.

Senator Frith: That is all he was trying to do, and therefore the objection—

Senator Roblin: No, he was not. He was speaking after someone else had made a speech. If he does not speak at the time the motion is put, if he introduces it, then that finishes it, according to that rule.

Senator Frith: At the time it is put.

Senator Roblin: Until the motion is put, there is nothing for the house to speak to—

Senator Frith: Correct.

Senator Roblin: —so there is no question there. In the case mentioned, I submit that clearly the rule that my honourable friend has just read was breached when my honourable friend spoke again. I must say that I am always delighted to hear him speak, and if leave had been required, as I believe it was, I would have been happy to have given it insofar as it lay with me to give it.

Senator Frith: The act of moving the motion before His Honour puts the motion is not what is referred to here. I am referring to speaking after the motion is put.

Senator Roblin: Who is disagreeing with that?

Senator Frith: You are.

Hon. David Walker: It was a good try.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will be delighted to know that I have something more to say before I move the adjournment. There is some agreement, on the basis of whispered advice I have been given, that we should have royal assent this evening at 8 o'clock. Therefore, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the Speaker of the Commons is holding a reception at Kingsmere this evening, an event which was rained out last week. I know of a number of honourable senators who plan to attend. I am wondering whether the Deputy Leader of the Government has taken that into consideration.

Senator Frith: Yes, I have. The House over which Madam Speaker Sauvé presides will be sitting at 8 o'clock this evening. Members of the other place will have to be present for royal assent, and I assume that she took into account the fact that at least one house of Parliament would be sitting at 8 o'clock this evening. It simply means that we shall also be sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, June 29, 1982

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Thirteenth Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 17)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, C. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses Section 6(a) of the Atlantic Coast Marine Plant Regulations as made by SOR/81-363. In your Committee's judgment this provision is ultra vires Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act. In addition, if Section 6(a) were to be held valid by the courts, your Committee's judgment is that it amounts to an unusual and unexpected use of the power conferred on the Governor-in-Council by Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act.

2. Section 34.2 of the Fisheries Act empowers the Minister to set conditions, of types there defined, in licences issued for the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(a) of the Act empowers the Governor-in-Council to make regulations prohibiting, subject to the conditions of any licence issued by the Minister under Section 34.2, the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(b) of the Act empowers the Governor-in-Council to make regulations prohibiting, notwithstanding the conditions of any licence, the harvesting of marine plants or any class therefor in any area or areas of the coastal waters of Canada for such period or periods as are specified in any such regulation. Section 6(a) of the Regulations under report prohibits the harvesting of Irish moss of the species Chondrus crispus, wire weed or horsetail notwithstanding the conditions of a licence issued by the Minister, during the period "from 1 January to December 31". To stipulate a period from January 1 to December 31 is to make the limitation or prohibition indefinite, or even perpetual, and to reproduce in substance the very provision in the original Section 6(a) to which your Committee objected in its Eighth Report for this Session (Statutory Instrument No. 13). That Report was withdrawn when the Minister caused the then Section 6(a) to be revoked.

3. The original form of Section 6(a), as made by SOR/78-867, failed to specify any period at all during which harvesting was prohibited notwithstanding the terms of a licence. The justification for this failure to abide by the requirements of Section 34.3(b) of the Act was that the failure to specify any period amounted to the specification of an indefinite period which complied with the requirement that harvesting be prohibited "for such period or periods as are specified". The line of reasoning that failure to specify any period amounted to the specification of a period, albeit an indefinite one, was rejected by Addy J., in the Federal Court of Canada in Dantex Wollen Co. Inc. v. Minister of Industry, Trade & Commerce (1979) 2 F.C. 585. To specify a period from 1 January to 31 December as has now been done appears to your Committee to be a further attempt to specify an indefinite period in contravention of the statutory requirement to specify "such period or periods" during which marine plants may not be harvested notwithstanding the conditions of a harvesting licence. If your Committee is wrong in its legal conclusion it is of the view that Parliament never intended, in enacting Section 34.3(b), of the Fisheries Act, to allow a licence to be in effect suspended indefinitely and that the attempt to achieve this result by specifying an indefinite period of prohibition amounts to an unusual and unexpected use of power. What Parliament has in contemplation was the imposition of prohibitions of certain duration. It is true that the indefinite period now provided for in Section 6(a) is limited in area. If, however, a power is needed to suspend a licence in a particular area for an indefinite period, Parliament should be asked to grant the power. The Minister has rejected this course as impractical. He has also rejected your Committee's suggestion that the conditions attached to licences be altered so that they specify on their face that they cannot be used in the location now specified in Section 6(a) of the Regulations. By rejecting these suggestions the Minister is issuing or continuing in force licences which are in a sense counterfeit. Your Committee regards this as an abuse of Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, June 30, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

June 30, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill C-61, intituled: "An Act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act", has in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, May 26, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. CARL GOLDENBERG

Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Goldenberg, for Senator Neiman, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

THIRD REPORT OF THE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Lowell Murray, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, presented the following report:

Wednesday, June 30, 1982

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages has the honour to present its Third Report as follows:

In accordance with its Orders of Reference in the Senate dated May 27, 1980, April 23, 1981, and May 11, 1982, and its Orders of Reference in the House of Commons dated May 23, 1980, April 23, 1981, and May 6, 1982, the Committee has considered the annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages for 1978, 1979, 1980 and 1981. Your Committee has also considered the subject-matter of Bill C-214, which was referred to it by the House of Commons on July 15, 1980.

Your Committee recommends:

THAT the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages be authorized, whenever the Committee deems necessary to do so, to adjourn from place to place within Canada, when the Senate and the House of Commons are not sitting, before October 8, 1982; and that, whenever it is deemed necessary, the Committee or its Members, as the case may be, be accompanied by the necessary staff; and that the Members of the Committee be authorized to travel outside Canada, accompanied by necessary staff, subject to the conditions set forth in the preceding paragraph of this recommendation.

Respectfully submitted

LOWELL MURRAY

Joint Chairman.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(e), I move that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fourth Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 4508)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—CONFLICTING MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. For some years now, and in fact, almost every six months, Bell Canada has felt the need to go before the CRTC to ask for a rate increase.

It seems an application was filed recently with the Commission for permission to increase residential rates by 25 per cent and business rates by 15 per cent next October.

Yesterday, the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Francis Fox, told reporters that the budget's 6 per cent ceiling on increases did not apply to Bell Canada and was aimed at other types of businesses. The Minister of State, the Honourable Serge Joyal, who was asked the same question about Bell Canada rate increases, answered that Mr. MacEacohen's budget had answered the question for him.

Could the Leader of the Government inform us, since the two ministers seem to be contradicting each other, whether the Minister of Communications was actually telling the truth, or whether the government will decide to apply its budgetary restrictions to Bell Canada as well, as it suggested?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice.

[English]

THE BUDGET

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

In his budget presentation on June 28, the Minister of Finance stated that federal agencies regulating transportation, communications and foodstuffs would be requested to follow guidelines which he outlined in his budget. Could the minister advise us as to which federal agencies regulating foodstuffs will be expected to follow those guidelines?

● (1415)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

GRAIN

RAIL TRANSPORTATION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Planted!

Senator Molgat: Yes, as a matter of fact it is planted because I have given him notice of the question.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Molgat: The reason I did so was because I have heard rumours that there are difficulties with the transportation of grain from the west because the railways have made substantial cuts in staff and they may not be able to meet their targets. This rumour is causing concern to some elements of the agriculture community in the west, and I want either to verify it or, hopefully, to quell it, if in fact the grain movement is adequate.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Molgat for having given me notice of his question. In my day in the House of Commons—and I think the Leader of the Opposition would agree with me—the normal practice was to send notice, and I think that is still a fairly good practice, although I can understand that often honourable senators do not wish to send notice, and that is perfectly fine also.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It depends on who is giving the answers.

Senator Argue: I am pleased to assure Senator Molgat, and honourable senators generally, that the transportation system is working exceedingly well. We are breaking all records, and it is really encouraging to be responsible for part of the economy that is doing so well, when other elements of the economy are obviously in difficulty.

Senator Asselin: You should have advised the Minister of Finance of that.

Senator Argue: The unloads of grain at Thunder Bay were 8,524 for the week of June 21 to June 26, the highest weekly level of car unloads since August 1972. Up until June 26 of this crop year, car unloads at Thunder Bay were 218,794 as compared with 208,055 last year—an increase of approximately 10,000 cars.

West coast unloads have been performing well despite a fire on a Fraser River bridge and despite a difficult winter. West coast grain exports set a new all-time record in early June with almost two months to go in the crop year. Up until June 23, exports out of the west coast were approximately 10.4 million tonnes as compared to 9.5 million tonnes a year ago. Exports from all parts to June 23, 1983, are 22.9 million tonnes compared with 19 million tonnes at the same date in the last crop year. This is almost 4 million tonnes higher than a year ago.

Exports of barley are exceeding all previous records. The previous record for exports of barley was 5.020 million tonnes.

At June 23 this record had been exceeded, with exports, up to that date, of 5.235 million tonnes.

Senator Asselin: Dispense!

Senator Argue: As I have just mentioned, the performance is excellent. The railways are doing a first-class job. The hopper cars are showing up to great advantage, and I expect that by the end of July the export target of 26 million tonnes for this year will have been exceeded by a substantial amount.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, was the minister replying to a question of which he did not have notice?

Senator Argue: I was given notice of it at about 10 o'clock this morning.

Senator Flynn: He had enough time.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME BEEF PRODUCERS—IMPACT OF GILSON REPORT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. As a result of the recommendations of the Gilson report, could the minister—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did you give notice?

Senator Bosa: No, I did not give notice.

Senator Asselin: You should have.

• (1420)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I didn't notice any notice.

Senator Bosa: As a result of the recommendation of the Gilson report, would the minister indicate how maritime farmers, specifically beef producers in the maritimes, might be affected by the proposed change in the transportation rate?

Senator Argue: Maritime wheat producers—is that the question?

Senator Bosa: Maritime beef producers.

Senator Argue: The question is: How would maritime beef producers be affected by the recommendation of the Gilson report? Obviously, they will not be affected by the recommendations unless and until they are implemented, and that may take some considerable time.

I do not like to speculate on what method will be used, but, obviously, if the payments were made to the producers and if the price of grain were reduced by the amount of the freight subsidy, this might have some effect. Basically, it will have little or no effect on beef producers outside of the prairies.

GRAIN

VOMITOXIN CONTAMINATION OF 1981 ONTARIO AND QUEBEC WINTER WHEAT CROPS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I too would like to direct a question to our widely travelled Minister of

[Senator Argue.]

State for the Canadian Wheat Board, while he is still in the capital.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did you give notice?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That was a nasty shot; that was a cheap shot.

Senator Asselin: Raise an objection.

Senator Haidasz: Can the minister tell us to what extent vomitoxin, a fungus closely related to the carcinogenic agent, aflatoxin, has contaminated the winter crops in Ontario and Quebec?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I thank the honourable senator for having given notice of this question some time ago.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I will read from an answer which was prepared for me.

There were very minor levels of toxins detected in the Ontario and Quebec crops in 1981. There are almost always detectable levels of toxins in grain, particularly in eastern grain, because of the higher humidity during the growing and ripening season.

The vomitoxin detected in such large levels in the 1980 crop is suspected to arise from a condition of the crop leading to the development of fusarium fungus contamination. However, it is known that fusarium-infected grain does not necessarily contain undesirable levels of vomitoxin. Detection and measurement of levels of infection of vomitoxin require elaborate laboratory equipment and are time-consuming.

The Department of Agriculture has budgeted funds for the establishment at the Winnipeg research station to improve that department's analytical capability. Part of this involves the use of extensive laboratory equipment. The Canadian Grain Commission, which is responsible for the grading standards for Canadian grain, is working closely with Agriculture Canada's research branch in developing standards and monitoring techniques to ensure a safe and dependable product free from toxic residues.

A great deal of attention is being paid to this matter in the Department of Agriculture, in the Canadian Grain Commission, as well as in other federal departments. This is a very complex subject and will require several years of research.

The short answer to the question is that the quality of grain to which the honourable senator refers is good and is much higher than the year before when there was some difficulty in this regard.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Can he inform us whether the dangerous pesticide, captan, has been used to control this problem, and whether that pesticide is still being used for any other purpose in Canada?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice.

THE BUDGET

PROVISIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions regarding the budget. I hope to say a few additional words in this regard this afternoon in the form of a short speech.

Questions were asked on June 28. Although I have replies to some of them, the replies to others are in the course of preparation.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: You have not figured them out yet.

Senator Perrault: Senator Roblin asked for comment on the increase in financial requirements for 1982-83.

● (1425)

The deteriorating economic situation has resulted in a sharp increase in the government's financial requirements for 1982-83 relative to the requirements projected in the November budget. As a consequence, the federal government will have a much greater presence in our financial markets than had been anticipated. However, the weakening economy has also reduced the demands of other borrowers, while high interest rates and uncertainty have led to increased savings. Therefore, it is not anticipated that the additional government borrowing will either force other potential borrowers out of the financial market or place upward pressure on interest rates.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would my honourable friend kindly repeat that last sentence? He could not have got it right the first time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to read the words provided by the Minister of Finance.

Therefore, I do not anticipate that the additional government borrowing will either force other potential borrowers out of the financial market or place upward pressure on interest rates.

At the same time, it is considered that the government's fiscal stance is appropriate in the circumstances. The minister does not believe that an even higher deficit would be prudent. He says that we should recognize that the forthcoming economic recovery will lead to increased borrowing demands by the private sector and that those demands will be accommodated by the financial markets. Continued restraint and the recovery of both our government revenues and the economy will result in reduced financial requirements.

Senator Roblin: That is the triumph of hope over experience.

Senator Perrault: I am glad to see that Senator Roblin calls for hope in the nation. That is a worthy call.

Another of Senator Roblin's questions asked for a breakdown by income group of the effects of the reduction in the indexation of the exemption on personal income taxes. It is suggested that Senator Roblin refer to Table 6.2 on page 29 of the Supplementary Information and Notice of Ways and Means Motion on the Budget.

Senator Roblin also wanted to know what was left over from the November 1981 budget. Here we suggest that the honourable senator refer to pages 6 and 7 of the Minister of Finance's speech to be found in the budget package. For more details, honourable senators may wish to have a look at the Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, which is contained in the budget package. There is also a paper outlining the revised rules relating to the taxation of life insurance. These documents will provide, I think, heartening answers to Senator Roblin's question.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I might, I will tell my honourable friend that the documents reached me after I had asked my question. What he tells me now is quite correct. I have looked them over and the situation is even worse than I had expected.

Senator Perrault: Senator Flynn wanted to know why the government decided to reduce the indexation rate on personal income taxes rather than to simply increase the income tax rates.

Honourable senators, the government chose this route because it was felt to be the most effective in generating non-inflationary growth. By linking the tax increase to the indexation formula rather than announcing an increase in personal income taxes, individuals are given greater personal incentive in meeting the government's target of an inflation rate of 6 per cent.

Senator Roblin also wanted to know if the 6 per cent ceiling on indexing applied to personal income tax. He also wanted to know the quantification of savings to the government.

A 6 per cent ceiling on indexing has indeed been applied to personal income tax for the year 1982-83, which will provide savings of $160 million; and for the year 1983-84, which will provide savings of $1.14 billion.

Senator Roblin: You mean increased taxation. "Savings"—what a perversion of language!

Senator Perrault: A question was also put asking whether the payments to the provinces were involved in the 6 per cent principle. Since a limit of 6 per cent has been imposed on the indexing of personal income tax, old age security payments and family allowance payments to the provinces are involved.

Senator Roblin also asked a series of questions involving employment measures in the budget. Further details of particular programs will be announced shortly by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I shall be pleased to bring the information to the Senate as soon as it is available.

I do, however, have some of the answers to Senator Roblin's other questions. The honourable senator was absolutely correct in saying that what is taking place is a reordering of priorities. There are, therefore, no new allocations for employment programs. If he wishes to trace the flow of funds, it is suggested that he refer to the budget document entitled "Supplementary Information and Notice of Ways and Means Motion on the Budget," and, in particular, Table 2.3 on page 13, which details the information he seeks.

Senator Roblin: I have now seen it.

● (1430)

Senator Perrault: Finally, on the subject of employment, Senator Roblin wished to know the policy of the government on financing the unemployment insurance fund.

Fiscal projections point to an increase in the deficit in the unemployment insurance account of $2.2 billion for this year. The current employee-employer premium rates are $1.65-$2.30 per $100 of insurable earnings. These rates were established at the time of the November 12 budget and they will remain in force through 1982. No decision has yet been made as to what the rates will be in 1983. For the purposes of the fiscal projections, however, it was assumed that the rate would be $2.35-$3.30 per $100 of insurable earnings in 1983, these rates being estimates of what would be required to balance benefit payments and premium contribution in 1983.

As for Senator Roblin's questions concerning the government policy in respect of provincial legislation involving wages, I think it is pretty obvious that the national government would like the co-operation of the provinces in restoring confidence in the economy. Talks, of course, are under way at this very time. It should be repeated, however, that the Prime Minister will probably have some comments to make after the meeting of first ministers this afternoon.

Finally, Senator Roblin wished to know what proportion of the total intake of the federal government will be required to pay the interest on the debt. Honourable senators, the latest figures provided for me by the Minister of Finance indicate that the proportion will be in the vicinity of 22.7 per cent.

Honourable senators, Senator Bosa wanted to know what happens to salary or contract settlements that took place prior to today in other sectors of society under federal jurisdiction. As I understand it, the new policy will apply to all those working under federal jurisdiction. The President of the Treasury Board, however, is tabling a bill on that very subject today in the other place, and the document containing the information sought by the honourable senator should be here shortly. I shall be pleased to bring further details to the Senate on Monday.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS— ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Roblin on June 28 last concerning the government's view on the recommendation of the Subcommittee on National Defence that there should be a new white paper on national defence.

Well, that is another question—

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Come on; let's hear it.

Senator Perrault: Well, these are delayed answers. Why not?

Honourable senators, the government is still studying the proposal and is considering what action it might take.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I am very pleased to provide that information.

Senator Molgat asked a question on June 28 concerning the recent 11 per cent pay increase in the armed forces.

Honourable senators, the measures announced by the Minister of Finance are not retroactive insofar as the pay increase to the armed forces is concerned; however, future pay increases will be limited to 6 per cent in 1983, and to 5 per cent in 1984.

On the same day, Senator McElman also asked a question, which concerned the reference to the reallocation of military pay and defence reprofiling.

Honourable senators, the reallocation of military pay and defence reprofiling referred to by Senator McElman means simply that some decisions in terms of capital expenditures have been deferred. This will not affect the major procurement programs, nor will it affect the current manning level in the Department of National Defence. I have been assured by the Minister of National Defence that there is room to absorb such a budget cut without hurting any major programs.

THE BUDGET

PROVISIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, one of the answers given to me, I think, is based on either an incorrect phrasing of my question, or a misunderstanding on the part of the minister.

When we discussed the question of the percentage that interest payments represent, I made reference to the percentage of government revenue, not government expenditure. I think the Leader of the Government gave me the percentage of the expenditure amount, namely, 21 or 22 per cent. The real meaning of my question is: What percentage of government revenue do those interest payments represent? I think the answer will turn out to be 26 or 27 per cent.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice, and we will clarify the point as quickly as possible.

THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEETINGS—ALLOCATION OF ROOMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order with regard to an answer the Deputy Leader of the Government gave yesterday. I could not do anything about this earlier because my copy of Debates of the Senate of yesterday had not arrived in my office at five minutes to two. Incidentally, that is another story. I understand that the Printing Bureau is ordered by the House of Commons to give priority to that house. Why we cannot get our Debates at the same time as the other place is another mystery.

The deputy leader did not reply adequately to my question with regard to allocation of committee rooms. It appears that it has been the practice that the Railway Committee Room is given by the House of Commons to the press, while the Senate gives them room 256-S, but who gives that authority? Do they ask the Senate if they can use room 256-S? If so, whom do they ask, and why are they given the use of that room, even though it may have been the custom over the years.

The Deputy Leader of the Government told me the other day that he did not give the authority, and neither he nor the Leader of the Government knew who did. Evidently the chairman of the committee indicated that he was not aware of who gave that permission. Who in the Senate gives authority for anyone in the country to use space that is allocated to honourable senators? Surely there has to be some responsibility here.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Black Rod has general jurisdiction over the use and administration of space in the Senate. I assume that in this case, because it had been a tradition for the press to use that room on budget night, permission was given. However, I do not know whether or not Black Rod specifically gave that permission. It seems to me that the main issue here is one of conflict.

I am sure that Senator Marshall, or any other honourable senator, would not object to a room, otherwise not being used, being so used. If I understand Senator Marshall's point correctly—and it is one with which I agree—when senators are evicted from space in order to meet a request or follow a tradition, then that is a matter about which we should be concerned. I assume it was just an oversight, and, in any event, due note has been taken of Senator Marshall's point.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the same room was used the next morning, it would mean that either someone was hired on an overtime basis, or the staff worked through the night, to rearrange the room. Will the CBC be required to reimburse the Senate for any extra pay that might have been given to the staff, and will the CBC be required, in this period of restraint, to pay rent for space on Parliament Hill? I should like an answer to this question.

Senator Frith: I shall try to obtain that information for the honourable senator.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, regarding replies to questions on the Order Paper, I have made a little list. Some questions have been on the Order Paper for periods of 21 months, 17 months and 15 months. I am wondering who is responsible for providing answers to written questions, and why simple questions cannot be answered promptly.

To help whoever is responsible, let me take, as an example, Question No. 36 on the Order Paper, asked by the Honourable Senator Bosa on October 16, 1980. The question is:

What is the average tenure of office of (a) Senators, and (b) Members of the House of Commons?

I looked through my own speeches and found that on October 26, 1978, I listed the tenure of senators. For the information of whoever is responsible, and to help the staff during this period of restraint, the average tenure of senators is 8.32 years and the average tenure of members of the House of Commons is 7.23 years. That will help him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator. That is one question that we can cross off as having been answered.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, in all fairness, the question to which Senator Marshall referred was answered over a year ago. I cannot understand why the question still appears on the Order Paper. The answer to that question was delivered to my desk.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Personal service.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON MONEY MARKET

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is it the position of the government that the havoc on Canadian stock markets yesterday, the decline in bond prices yesterday, and the further decline in the Canadian dollar yesterday, are unrelated to the budget brought in by Mr. MacEachen on Monday night?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hope to make some remarks in connection with those phenomena later this day.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANADA/NEWFOUNDLAND AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENT—PROJECTS

Question No. 68 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

With regard to the Canada/Newfoundland Agricultural Development Subsidiary Agreement, (i) what is the breakdown, by federal district, of all projects introduced in the Province of Newfoundland since the inception of the Agreement and (ii) what are the amounts of each payment?

Reply by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion:

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC, FISCAL AND ENERGY POLICIES OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 10:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the Senate of Canada do urge the Federal Government to re-direct its economic, fiscal and energy policies, and bring forward as soon as possible a new budget; such budget to provide proper economic direction, improved employment opportunities and measures to restore national confidence in the economy.—(Honourable Senator Charbonneau).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government wishes to fulfil an undertaking he gave to speak to this Order, and Senator Charbonneau has agreed to yield to him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Perrault speak now in this debate instead of Senator Charbonneau?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1440)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the motion advanced by the opposition and proposed by Senator Phillips calls for a redirection of the federal government's economic, fiscal and energy policies.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And for a new budget.

Senator Perrault: Last Monday evening an event of some importance took place in this nation. The Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister, the Honourable Allan MacEichen, an outstanding servant of the Canadian people, brought forward a new budget which responds to the serious economic situation we face in this country. We do not minimize the seriousness of the situation, nor should it be minimized by any other Canadian.

We in Canada are facing a challenge. We believe this budget offers Canadians a way to end the recession and to speed our progress towards recovery insofar as it is possible to do so through domestic initiatives. The budget calls on all Canadians to join in developing a solution. Like so many other countries, Canada has been wrestling with economic problems and difficulties—

Hon. C. William Doody: Since 1968.

Senator Perrault:—since 1973, when world oil prices began to escalate to such a large extent. We are feeling the impact of this recession now through high unemployment, dwindling profits, increasing bankruptcies and declining output in productivity.

The recession in other industrialized countries has added to our hardships. It is folly to assume that we can insulate ourselves from the ravages of an international recession. These are facts which are truly beyond dispute. Canada is one of the nations in the world which depends to a very great extent on its export sales for its prosperity. When markets decline abroad, we have trouble. We cannot insulate ourselves from the effects of the economic policies of our trading partners, especially those of our neighbour to the south. The persistence of high interest rates, along with other actions in that country, are obstacles to our economic recovery and well-being. The Minister of Finance made it very clear the other evening that he is not attempting to place all the blame on the United States or other countries. Mistakes have been made by all governments in the history of Canada. I believe it was the late President John F. Kennedy who said, "Governments do very well if they are right 50 per cent of the time." I suggest this government has been right well over 50 per cent of the time.

Senator Flynn: How dare you!

Senator Perrault: It's nice to see that the Leader of the Opposition is listening and laughing. Obviously, he is in a good mood.

Senator Flynn: That is one of your best jokes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He is not laughing with you; he is laughing at you.

Senator Perrault: There is some hope in the preliminary figures coming out of the United States. A modest recovery may soon be on its way.

Hon. Martial Asselin: When?

Senator Flynn: We have heard that for three years now.

Senator Perrault: And that is good news for Canada. To benefit fully from this recovery and to bring about the recovery of this country, Canadians must face squarely the challenge of bringing down inflation. That is the number one thrust of the budget introduced on Monday evening. Unless we beat inflation and unless we significantly reduce inflation, we will not be able to compete. We are still experiencing intolerably high rates of inflation, which cost us severely in terms of jobs and growth.

Primary among our goals is to bring down the vicious spiral whereby incomes chase prices, which in turn chase incomes. We must convince ourselves that inflation will not remain high indefinitely. Price inflation can be beaten if we accept that our income increases must be lower than the rate of inflation. In an attempt to achieve faster progress in reducing inflation, the government is calling on all Canadians to bear a share of the collective efforts to bring down inflation.

Honourable members of the opposition know that the federal government does not exercise total control over the economic levers in this country. They know that 60 per cent of all the taxes raised and the money spent is raised and spent by the provinces and municipalities, that the federal government's share is only 40 per cent, and that two-thirds of all labour-management relations are under provincial jurisdiction. The federal government does not have some sort of big red economic lever which it can crank in order to change things overnight.

Senator Roblin: That is not what you said at election time.

Senator Perrault: Members of the opposition are aware of this. Many of the provinces, headed by Conservative governments and Conservative premiers, are running substantial deficits these days and are wrestling with similar problems of their own.

Senator Asselin: You were excused in advance.

Senator Perrault: What am I trying to suggest? I am suggesting that we are all involved in this effort to restore the buoyancy of the Canadian economy. It cannot be done by one political party or by one government in this nation.

Senator Flynn: That is not what you said during the 1980 campaign.

Senator Perrault: That is the reason why the premiers are meeting at the Conference Centre this afternoon. There are no miracles, just hard work involved.

Senator Flynn: And lies.

Senator Perrault: I repeat, primary among our goals is to break the vicious spiral whereby incomes chase prices, which in turn chase incomes. We must convince ourselves that inflation will not remain high indefinitely.

Hon. Lowell Murray: You have read that already.

Senator Perrault: We cannot have conscientious objectors who will not enter the battle. I can remember the period of time when we were setting up a wage and price guidelines policy following a past election.

Senator Flynn: After having lied to the people of Canada.

Senator Perrault: We would receive letters from companies which would say something to the effect, "Dear Prime Minister," or "Dear Minister, may we commend you for your courageous attempt to bring down the inflation rate in this country? May we commend you for the wage and price guidelines you have established? We say you should proceed with courage and strength." Then in the second paragraph they would say, "Of course, you understand that our industry is in a special category, and that we should be exempt from these guidelines." Then they would proceed to list their reasons.

I suggest that the state of the economy today is such that we cannot afford the luxury of having any sector of society opt out and say that these guidelines should not apply. We cannot afford to have the head of the largest trade union in Canada saying, "We are not going to be bound by any guidelines, and we are going to take all the system can give us". We cannot have the head of a major organization telling the Canadian people and political parties of the country to go you-know-where.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Shame!

Senator Perrault: It is a shame that such statements are made by people who should realize the gravity of the situation. There is no long-term benefit to the workers of this nation if they are going to be paid in a basically debased dollar which has no real purchasing power. The best service the labour leaders of this nation can perform for their workers is to urge them to increase productivity, and then they will be indemnified in dollars which have real purchasing power. That is the kind of message that Mr. McDermott should be delivering to the people of this country.

In an attempt to achieve faster progress in reducing inflation, the government is calling on all Canadians to bear a share of the collective efforts to bring down inflation. Restraint and discipline in our income demands will restore growth in the economy and generate the jobs we need to meet our economic potential. The government will lead the way by imposing limits of 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year on pay increases for over 500,000 public sector employees. In addition, ministers of the Crown, members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate are doing their share by accepting a five per cent pay cut for the rest of the year. The pay restraint program will lower federal expenditures by some $250 million this year and $550 million next year. These funds will be redirected to those in the greatest need in our society, for increases in the child tax credit, for GIS recipients, to assist small business, farmers and fishermen, and to enhance our housing program.

● (1450)

Savings from the public sector restraint program will not be sufficient, however, to lift the burden of inflation from those least able to protect themselves. For those reasons, indexation for taxpayers and recipients of some transfer payments will be limited to 6 per cent in 1983 and to 5 per cent in 1984. Families with modest incomes will not be hurt, as the child tax credit not only remains fully indexed but will be increased by $50 for the 1982 taxation year. For those at the other end of the age spectrum, the guaranteed income supplement will also continue to be fully indexed, and its recipients will receive an additional supplement to offset the indexation limit of the old age security payments.

Inflation is also perpetuated in increases in so-called regulated prices—prices for telephones, transportation, foodstuffs and components; indeed, the essentials of every-day life for Canadian families. Here again, the government is taking the lead by requesting that federal agencies keep in line with the objectives set out in the budget.

Senator Phillips, in his motion, calls for measures “to restore national confidence in the economy.” Honourable senators, the government is taking immediate action to strengthen investment and to build consumer and business confidence. A committee of prominent Canadians is to be set up; their names were given to honourable senators yesterday. These financial, legal, accounting and economic experts will examine proposals to reduce the taxation of investment income and interest rates to borrowers and will report to the Minister of Finance not later than September 30. Canadians are invited to comment on these proposals, and they will be implemented once their feasibility has been confirmed.

Several modifications have been made to the November budget tax measures following extensive consultation with many groups across the country. There has been a good deal of discussion on this point in recent days in this chamber.

Foreign investment will continue to make a positive contribution to Canada's economic development. To ensure that that is done in the most effective and expedient manner, several recommendations following the review of the Foreign Investment Review Agency will be the subject of action. These changes include increased thresholds for small business procedures and greater clarity and speed of decision-making in full review cases.

This budget also makes it clear that because we are well on target in our Canadianization goals, the government does not intend to accelerate the pace of acquisition of foreign energy holdings.

Honourable senators, there are many areas in our economy that require immediate attention. I am certain that each and every one of us has received representations from small businessmen, farmers and fishermen facing financial difficulty. We have heard from people who must renegotiate their mortgages at enormously high interest rates and from people who fear they will lose their homes. No doubt many of us have seen the high costs in human, social and economic terms of record levels of unemployment. The higher-than-anticipated level of the budgetary deficit, $19.6 billion, has been the topic of a great deal of discussion in recent days and the subject of many editorials across the country. It is a cause for concern. It is caused essentially by the drastically reduced revenues and increased expenditures which flow from the dramatic downturn in the economy. But how serious is the deficit? Is it the disaster portrayed by some people who write articles in newspapers?

An Hon. Senator: Yes, it is.

Senator Perrault: Well, an honourable senators says, “Yes, it is,” but should it trigger a selling of stocks on the marketplace? Should it cause a loss of confidence?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may be of interest to remind ourselves that in 1942 and 1943 the deficits in this country represented over 20 per cent of the gross national product. The only meaningful ratio, when defining or discussing the deficit, is to look at it in relation to the gross national product, which is an indicator of a nation's ability to repay that deficit sooner or later. It might surprise some honourable senators to know that since the budget on Monday, papers published by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, highly respected throughout the world, indicate that the ratio in Canada will be 5.2 per cent next year, while in the United States the ratio will be 5.4 per cent next year. The ratio in Canada is substantially lower than in many other countries of the world.

These are significant facts. This is not the kind of information which should trigger a selling wave on the stockmarket. The business leaders of this country, knowing the problems we are having selling our products abroad, should take great satisfaction in the fact that in relation to our gross national product our deficit is not out of line. It is not out of line and it is not alarming. It is a matter of concern. We must do better. We have to strive to do better. But it is not a disaster scenario. It is not a scenario in which Canada somehow is the only nation in the world going over the cliff. We are not going over any cliff. Our ratio compares favourably with that of most of our trading partners. As I have already mentioned, it is but a fraction of the ratio in relation to the GNP which prevailed during the war years of 1942 and 1943.

We talk about the deficit and about inflation and the worries associated with that. Some of us are old enough to remember at least part of the hungry thirties. We have to remind ourselves of what we are trying to do in this budget. Some of us can recall books like The Ten Lost Years, by Mr. Broadfoot, in which he outlined the tragedies visited upon thousands of families in all of the provinces of Canada.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Well, you ain't seen nuthin' yet!

Senator Perrault: Well, that is not the attitude that is going to cause a recovery in this nation. One of the honourable senators in opposition—and let's put it on the record—says, "You ain't seen nuthin' yet!" I hope the senator does not really represent the philosophy of the Conservative Party, which seems to traffic in doom, gloom and disaster—and derives enjoyment from it. Yes, they derive enjoyment from it.

Senator Donahoe: I lived in the dirty thirties.

Senator Perrault: Well, you may have lived in the dirty thirties, but let's not have the dirty eighties. Let's turn this economy around. We need your co-operation, senator. We—

Senator Flynn: You sure need something. You lack a lot.

Senator Perrault: We want you on the building team and not on the wrecking crew.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: We want a message to go out to the people of this country, whether they are Conservatives, Liberals, NDP or anything else—

Senator Flynn: You have no credibility; that's the problem.

Senator Perrault: —that the first thing we must do to move toward recovery is to appraise realistically what we can do as a nation and a government. We have to have a stock-taking to find out what our assets are and what the problems are. For instance, there is nothing the government can do about the price of commodities.

Senator Flynn: You were born yesterday.

Senator Perrault: If the opposition have some suggestions on what we can do to bounce up the price of commodities in the world and to bounce up demand, will they please let us know?

Senator Flynn: Sure. Resign!

Senator Perrault: There is nothing the government can do about the fact that copper is selling at 58 cents a pound—an historic low unmatched since the 1930s. I cannot bring any comfort to the copper miners in my province of British Columbia, and I cannot bring any comfort to the miners of Ontario with world prices at those levels, and the opposition knows that. So don't traffic in the gloom, doom and disaster in that industry. Don't take any wry satisfaction from thinking that somehow some political gain can be achieved by riding that horse.

Senator Flynn: Don't build straw men.

Senator Perrault: The situation exists as well for resources such as zinc, lead and lumber. While this is of little consolation to our hard-pressed mining industry and those who live on the production of natural resources, I don't believe that even our greatest critics would presume for a moment that there is anything we can do as a country to increase the cost of those commodities which are of such vital importance to full economic recovery.

● (1500)

Sooner or later the economic fortunes of our trading partners will improve. Copper, silver, gold, zinc and lumber will increase in price. The lumber market in the United States will open again. They are not building houses in the United States. The province of British Columbia derives 50 per cent of its economy directly or indirectly from the forestry industry, and if houses are not being constructed in the United States, I ask you how anyone can sell lumber to them.

Senator Flynn: We are not speaking of the United States; we are speaking of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Therefore, the important questions facing this country are: Will we be in a position to take advantage of the economic resurgence of our trading partners? When the economy comes back, as it appears to be doing in the United States, are we going to be in a position to move from that point and be able to compete successfully in these re-opening markets? Will we be competitive in six months, nine months or one year from now, or even sooner, when our traditional trading partners turn to Canada to see what the costs of its raw materials will be and should be? Are we going to price ourselves completely out of the market? If we were to do that, we would not be able to compete.

We will not be competitive with a 12 per cent inflation rate. This is the message which I think must be echoed again and again across Canada. We have to put the welfare of this nation ahead of any other consideration, even political ambition.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Resign, then!

Senator Perrault: With a 12 per cent inflation rate—

Senator Flynn: Call an election, then.

Senator Perrault: —we are running the risk of pricing ourselves out of the competitive market. I believe that most Canadians appreciate and understand that fact.

Inflation is something that we cannot ignore, although most of us at times would like to. Ironically, unlike unemployment, where everyone is a loser, there are winners and losers in the fight against inflation. Decent Canadians who are listening to the dialogue on Parliament Hill these days know that some of the winners are those people with money in the bank. Some senior citizens, some young people, people who have saved money which they have earned or have invested that money in the bank earning 16 per cent, 17 per cent or 18 per cent in interest. Some of them are winners right now.

Senator Roblin: After taxes, what is it? There's no way they are winners.

Senator Perrault: In relation to other people, they are winners.

Other winners are those who have had their wages or incomes totally insulated from the negative impact of inflation through COLA clauses. Other winners are those with job security. They are hardly affected by inflation. No one begrudges them their insulation. They are fortunate to have that, and no one should derive pleasure from categorizing these people as winners. I do not want to speak in derogatory terms, but these are statements of fact.

The losers in the fight against inflation are the ones who should concern honourable senators and all Canadians from coast to coast. They are obvious to all of us who really care.

There are the 1.2 million Canadians who are unemployed through no fault of their own. They are the 1.2 million Canadians out of work because of the tight monetary policy of this government, a legitimate policy in relation to the United States of America, a policy which exists in virtually every industrialized country in the world.

It is not hard to define the other losers; they are the small businessmen who, because of the continental interest rate policy and our inability to ignore that policy, must borrow to survive. Those people are the ones who have invested a great deal of money in a particular business and are now seeing it go down the drain. They are the real losers, the great tragedies; and government does not rush to save them either. If a business grows, has 5,000 employees, they go to the government and tell the government that it cannot allow them to close down, that the government must save them.

Hon. Eric Cook: Is that what Dome did?

Senator Perrault: What about the haberdashery shop down the street? What about someone with a small business on Main Street? We all know those people. Those are the people who deserve some sympathy.

Senator Roblin: Precisely.

Senator Perrault: They must borrow to survive to meet their payroll and cash flow, let alone to expand their business. Unless things improve, small businessmen are destined eventually to go bankrupt in large numbers. That has already taken place in some parts of the country. As well, larger business concerns, some of them household names, have cash-flow problems. I could go on and on listing the losers.

What we are trying to do is introduce measures which will start creating some winners in society. They will put us in a competitive position again.

The inflation rate places severe constraints on the government's ability to meet the needs of these worthy Canadians, these losers; nevertheless, the savings achieved through government restraint and other measures are being directed to creating jobs, to stimulating residential construction and to assisting small business, farmers and fishermen.

Allow me to give you a brief summary of those measures. In the job creation area, the government proposes to:

- direct $200 million toward employment programs;
- direct $150 million—which has already been announced—for localized, employment intensive projects;
- make available $100 million from existing CEIC programs;
- direct $300 million to economic development programs—

Senator Cook: For economic development—$300 million?

Senator Perrault: Yes, $300 million to economic development programs, and I hope that a large portion of that goes to Newfoundland, Senator Cook. Newfoundland is never forgotten.

[Senator Perrault.]

In the housing area, the government proposes to:

- make available $3,000 in grants to all purchasers of new houses and to first-time buyers of existing houses on which construction commences before December 31, 1982, the program to take effect immediately;
- double funds for the Home Renovation Plan;
- increase from 25,000 units to 27,500 units of non-profit and co-operative housing in 1982;
- allow flexibility in the Canada rental support plan;
- extend the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan for another year, with grants rather than deferrals.

In the area of small business, farmers and fishermen, the government proposes to:

- make available grants to reduce interest rates by 4 percentage points for two years—that is immediate—to finance small business, new investment and research and development, the total allocation there being $400 million;
- make available $100 million for assistance to farmers in financial difficulty.

Other measures besides the ones I have just enumerated have been discussed at some length in recent days in this chamber.

In the budget announced on June 28 it was made clear that the government feels it is time to share the burden in the fight against inflation. It is time for those of us who are fortunate enough to be categorized as winners to assume their moral and legal obligation to spread the impact of inflation across this country.

I know that not a single honourable senator regrets for one minute the increase in taxes, or the de-indexation of that money. That money, realized as a result of the budget measures introduced on Monday evening, will assist in providing funds to soften the negative impact on less fortunate Canadians.

Senator Flynn: The less fortunate will pay just the same.

Senator Perrault: I know that those who serve in this chamber have a sense of responsibility and want to assist in the economic recovery of this nation.

I urge honourable senators in opposition to support this government's economic program, which is designed to get us out of this recession and pave the way towards recovery. We believe a stimulative approach, given the strong inflationary pressures and the constraints of a high deficit, would not work. Instead, we are pursuing a positive co-operative approach which underlies the solidarity of sharing in our society so that these goals may be achieved.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the motion has some merit, but I believe that it can be improved. Therefore, in amendment, I move:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word: "That" in the first line and substituting the following therefor:

"this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government".

● (1510)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before the amendment is moved, I would ask Her Honour the Acting Speaker to consider and review the possibility that this amendment is entirely out of order. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate in order to deal with that point at a later date.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on that point, would it be appropriate to refer to an authority on the subject now? I am quite prepared to discuss it as a point of order when it comes up again.

Senator Roblin: What is your reference?

Senator Frith: It is page 154 of Beauchesne, fifth edition. It is a question of whether or not it is called an expanded negative. If it is treated as an expanded negative, it is out of order; if it is treated simply as an amendment with an opposite effect—I think those are the words—then it is in order. I will see that the reference is on the record for honourable senators to consider when it comes up again.

Senator Flynn: Her Honour the Acting Speaker will be able to consider this point in any case. I would ask her to put the motion so that we can register our objection.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the Senate of Canada do urge the Federal Government to re-direct its economic, fiscal and energy policies, and bring forward as soon as possible a new budget; such budget to provide proper economic direction, improved employment opportunities and measures to restore national confidence in the economy.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "That" in the first line and substituting the following therefor:

"this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe what should now be recorded is the point of order raised by Senator Flynn, and that the matter be adjourned subject to a ruling on the point of order. The reference I had for consideration by honourable senators is page 154 of Beauchesne, fifth edition, where Citation 431 reads as follows:

An amendment to alter the main question, by substituting a proposition with the opposite conclusion, is not an expanded negative and may be moved.

The question is whether this, in effect, substitutes a proposition with the opposite conclusion, or whether it is simply an expanded negative.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before Senator Flynn moves the adjournment of the debate, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? Is Petro-Canada considered to be one of those federal agencies which are to regulate prices according to the guidelines in the budget?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, on the point of order, may I ask if Her Honour would take into consideration as well Citation 436(1) at page 154 of Beauchesne, fifth edition, which reads as follows:

An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is precisely the question.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL TRAINING BILL

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-115, intituled: "An Act to establish a national program for occupational training"—(Honourable Senator Bird).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask if Senator Tremblay has laid all the groundwork he wishes for his amendment from the point of view of debate? If so, perhaps we could have the amendment on the record.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Tremblay may tell you what the substance of his amendment is, but we would not want to debate it this afternoon.

Senator Frith: In that case, we might as well let this order stand. The motion for third reading can be moved on Monday.

Order stands.

COOPERATIVE ENERGY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-116, to establish the Cooperative Energy Corporation and the Cooperative Energy Development Corporation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is adopted, I would like to say that I raised a point with the sponsor of this bill, Senator Argue, in connection with accountability to Parliament in view of the fact it involves $100 million of public funds. When I spoke on second reading I raised that point, and Senator Argue did not deal with it when he closed the debate. I spoke with him in committee the other day and raised the same point, and he said he would have to consider what to do about it.

I am rather disappointed that he is not in the chamber now to tell us how he intends to deal with that problem, because I gathered from listening to him in committee that he thought the point was one that ought to be addressed by himself as a minister of the Crown. While I do not intend to hold up third reading or vote against this bill, I want to express my disappointment at the fact that Senator Argue does not appear to want to discharge his obligation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we will see to it that what Senator Roblin has said is drawn to Senator Argue's attention.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL PRIVACY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-43, to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-43 deals with three basic subjects: First, access to information; secondly, privacy; and, thirdly, public interest immunity. It is an extremely important piece of legislation and, justifiably, can be called a milestone in democratic government encompassing, as it does, in one bill rights of access to government information, freedom of information, privacy and Crown privilege.

What Bill C-43 tries to do is balance the requirements of open government, fairness for individuals and organizations, and the necessary protection for the government in the carrying out of its responsibilities. With those elements or ingredients, it shares the objectives of Senator Flynn's private bill that he withdrew, with consent, the other day, as honourable senators will remember. It tries to achieve these objectives in three ways: First, it creates new rights; second, it extends existing rights; and third, it reforms some existing rights.

● (1520)

When I say that it creates new rights, I mean that it makes available to every Canadian and permanent resident a right of access to information held by over 130 federal government institutions. It outlines the necessary limits placed on that right as well as the conditions under which that right to information can be exercised.

To make those rights real and meaningful, it provides for external and independent review of government decisions that refuse access to information. In this way, it creates a framework for the basic rules for obtaining access to information where no such rules have existed before.

[Senator Roblin.]

It then extends the protection that is now given to personal information under Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act. It creates a detailed code of fair information practices that govern the collection, use, disclosure and retention of personal information.

It also reinforces the right that Canadians will have to receive information about themselves held by the government—again complemented by a system of external and independent reviews.

In making this extension, new privacy legislation will be established. The present personal information rights that Canadians have under the Canadian Human Rights Act will be replaced by clear and comprehensive legislation that will protect information held on an individual by the government.

As honourable senators will remember, the basic principles under Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act are extended in Bill C-43 to keep government institutions from collecting personal information on people that does not concern the operating programs of those institutions. The bill reaches even further by requiring government agencies to keep only accurate, complete and current information on individuals.

This particular privacy portion of the bill owes a great deal to the privacy legislation developed by our colleague, Senator Flynn, in Bill S-9.

I have now dealt with the first two elements which are to create and to extend. The third basic element of the bill is that it reforms the laws governing crown privilege in regard to evidence before the courts.

The absolute privilege which exists under section 41 of the Federal Court Act will be retained only for cabinet confidences. In all other cases, where a minister claims that information requested in judicial proceedings is privileged, it will be left to the courts to decide whether the information ought to be produced.

By way of illustration, honourable senators, and without getting into all the subtleties and niceties of the jurisprudence, it simply amounts to this: As the law presently stands, if I am acting for a plaintiff in a civil proceeding and I serve a notice to produce on the Crown, asking it to produce documents which I consider relevant to the issue before the court, and, of course, helpful to me in my case, the minister of the Crown need only say, "I refuse to produce that document because it is against the public interest for me to do so." That is what is meant by the expression "the absolute privilege."

What is intended in this third element is the reform of the present rules regarding the right of Crown privilege. I repeat the phrase I just used, namely, "the absolute privilege", which means that no one can go behind that. When the minister takes that position, I am out of court; I cannot force him to appear before the court in any way to explain and justify his claim of privilege.

That absolute privilege is maintained with reference to cabinet confidences. In all other cases where information is requested and it is claimed to be privileged, the question of whether the information ought to be produced will be left to the court to decide.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this three-pronged change—the creation of new rights, the extension of the privacy rights, and the suspension or modification of Crown privilege—is to strengthen the relationship between Canadians and their government. The bill gives Canadians better access to information about their government's decisions and actions concerning them.

Bill C-43 is also designed to equip Canadians with better machinery to discover the reasons for a particular course of government action. In these ways it seeks to help government to better serve the needs of Canadians.

By way of background, honourable senators, Bill C-43 has been a long time in the making and, because it has so many parliamentary sauces, in the sense of the impetus given it by many parliamentarians, it may be the exception to the broth that is spoiled by too many cooks. In this case, the broth may well have been improved by the length of the cooking.

The idea of improved public access to government information got its momentum in the mid-1960s from Barry Mather, an NDP member of the other place. He was the first to sponsor a private member's bill on freedom of information.

Hon. Peter Bosa: He was a former teacher.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Flynn and other Conservative colleagues have long argued for freedom of information legislation.

In 1977, the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Ron Basford, obtained consent from Parliament to adopt Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which is used today as the framework for the safeguarding of personal information. Not long after that, the Honourable John Roberts, the present Minister of the Environment, wrote a green paper on giving the public access to government documents. Then, Bill C-15, introduced by the Conservative government, and a draft of this measure, were used to compile Bill C-43, which is before us today.

The Honourable John Roberts' paper also gave Canada a unique approach to, and was an important element in this bill. I refer here to the two-tiered review of government decisions on access requests.

In 1979, the Honourable Walter Baker sponsored the Conservative government's freedom of information bill. That bill died on the Order Paper when the government was defeated, and a new freedom of information bill was later introduced by the Honourable Francis Fox in July 1980.

In the past, honourable senators have frequently referred to the need for legislation in the area of public access to information held by the government. Senators played an active role when the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments studied this question back in 1977-78 on the basis of the green paper issued by the government. The committee made a number of recommendations concerning the right of access, exemptions to the right of access, and how the system of independent review should operate. Many of these recommendations later found concrete expression in the freedom of information bill introduced by the Conservative government. That was the immediate ancestor of the bill now before us.

• (1530)

I understand that Senator Godfrey promoted the idea of a two-tiered review system involving, in the first instance, complaints to an ombudsman-like information commissioner, followed by recourse to the Federal Court. I am glad to be able to note that members of the Senate contributed so positively to the development, over the years, of the legislation on access to information and the protection of privacy.

Honourable senators, I have already mentioned the basic elements and objectives of this bill. There are three highlights of the bill which I think need an additional word of explanation. The first is the question of exemptions. The initial reaction to exemptions to a bill which grants important rights to all citizens is, it seems to me, a negative one. Therefore, we want to examine closely the reason for the exemptions and how they are defined. In this regard, Mr. Fox said, in the other place:

There is unanimous agreement on the need for exemptions; a surprisingly wide consensus on the types of information requiring special protection was seen. Our objective in devising the exemptions was to encompass only that information that had to be withheld from disclosure.

Like its Conservative predecessor, Bill C-43 attempts to be precise and detailed. The objective of the bill is to define the rights to information, to privacy, and to privileged documents in a wide, general way, and to describe the exemptions strictly and clearly. Therefore, the overall scheme is one in which the rights are granted and, only reluctantly, the exemptions are granted.

Another major highlight of the bill which deserves a further word of explanation is the independent review system. Up to now, if information has been requested of the government relating to its decisions, or, under the privacy provisions, relating to information of a more personal nature, difficulties have always arisen upon the refusal to release the relevant documents. In that case, the individual has had nowhere to turn. He could only urge the government to release the information by trying to exert pressure on it through whatever possible means, such as publicizing the matter through the press. However, there has been no appeal procedure in the face of such a refusal.

That problem will be resolved through the two-tiered review system provided for in this bill. First, it will be resolved by way of an information commissioner, who will be responsible for the hearing of grievances on the different aspects of the processing of requests for information. Secondly—and this represents the second tier—if the commissioner also refuses to allow an individual access to particular information, the applicant or the commissioner himself will be able to apply to the Federal Court for a review of the case. In a sense, therefore, it is a three-tiered right, beginning with the government institution, going then to the commissioner, and finally to the court.

The court will be given extensive powers under this legislation to deal with complaints, and will be able to order the government institution involved to release the requested information if it is the view of the court that the information should be released.

The importance of the information commissioner, honourable senators, cannot be stressed too much. The minister shares the opinion that the commissioner will be expected to take up the cause of persons seeking information and to defend their interests vis-à-vis officials and ministers. The information commissioner will be the key lever for the access of Canadians to information they are entitled to see.

When court reviews become necessary, the court will deal with the cases in two different ways, depending upon the circumstances. For example, if information is withheld for national security, foreign affairs or national defence reasons, the Federal Court will decide whether the minister has reasonable grounds upon which to refuse the release of the documents in question.

I have already explained the process whereby the minister can express his view that it is against the public interest. Up to the present time, the reasonableness of his grounds could not be questioned. Now it can be by the courts. If the court decides that the minister is wrong in his appraisal of the document, the court can order him to release it.

Honourable senators, as you can see, this two-tiered review system, which includes the powerful information commissioner and the court, will ensure that no Canadian will be kept from information he has every right to see.

The release of personal information by the government will be scrutinized by a privacy commissioner. When very sensitive information is under consideration for release to third parties, such as to the police—which is a problem about which we have heard a good deal and which is addressed by this bill—the privacy commissioner has been given the power to examine all disclosures carefully. The commissioner can then report to the head of the institution concerned and to Parliament itself when he discovers that a government institution has not complied with the legislation.

Honourable senators, the third highlight, about which I will speak briefly, concerns the reason why the access to information and privacy legislation were combined in one bill. This has been done because Bill C-43 allows for the solid integration of two parallel and complementary types of legislation. The principle that the right to privacy is much more important than is the right to have access to government information is recognized.

The release of personal information under the access to information part of the bill is determined by the principles contained in the privacy portions of the bill which deal with the releasing of personal information to third persons. Tying the two pieces of legislation together is meant to ensure complete consistency when dealing with personal information under both statutes. In this way, we shall avoid a problem that has plagued other countries that have freedom of information legislation, where rights to privacy and rights to access compete rather than complement one another, as this legislation is designed to bring about.

Another general feature of the bill which is important to Parliament, it seems to me, concerns the policy of the government. I believe that the policy of all previous sponsors of this type of legislation has been that it should be subject to a continuing process of review. In the other place the minister sponsoring the bill emphasized the fact that a committee of the other place will constantly be reviewing and attempting to bring up to date this legislation, in the sense that it should be kept consistent with experience.

Honourable senators, due to the length of time that the bill has been considered and because of the long study of its provisions over the years, which has led to its evolution in its present form, I have discussed with the Honourable Leader of the Opposition the advantages in having the bill receive royal assent before we adjourn, without a lengthy study of it before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. This is on the understanding that there will be an undertaking, which I now make on behalf of the government, that in the fall we shall refer the subject matter of the new law to a Senate committee for continuing study and analysis, particularly in the light of the evolving experience under this very important piece of legislation, which amounts almost to an addition to our Charter of Rights.

I recommend to honourable senators that this bill receive second reading.

Before I resume my seat, however, perhaps I could add one brief comment that I undertook to make on behalf of one of our colleagues. Senator Hicks is interested in this bill, and particularly in the provisions dealing with government decisions in the matter of scholarships, fellowships, research grants and so on, and the problem that might arise with regard to the absence of confidentiality in the case of reference letters, and that sort of thing. When I explained to him that Senator Flynn and I had discussed the possibility of the bill's proceeding to third reading before we adjourn, on the understanding that the law would receive further study by Commons and Senate committees, he simply asked that I place on the record his interest in this aspect of the bill and his satisfaction that this will receive study, among other aspects, in the manner I have outlined.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, in rising to move adjournment of the debate, I inform the Senate that it is my intention to yield to Senator Flynn when the debate is resumed.

On motion of Senator Donahoe, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, pursuant to notice:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 5th July, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, July 5, 1982, at 8 p.m.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, June 30, 1982

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages has the honour to present its Fourth Report as follows:

In accordance with its Orders of Reference from the Senate dated May 27, 1980 and April 23, 1981, and its Orders of Reference from the House of Commons dated May 23, 1980 and April 23, 1981, your Committee has considered the Annual Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages 1978, 1979 and 1980. Your Committee has also considered the subject-matter of Bill C-214, which was referred to it by the House of Commons on July 15, 1980.

Your Committee is presenting its report on language of work and equitable participation within the Public Service of Canada in two parts. Part I deals with the historical and judicial aspects of the language of work question and with the manner in which the Government has translated its language of work objectives into practice. Part II deals in greater detail with the hearings of the Committee and includes, among other things, an evaluation of the capacity of certain departments to meet their language of work responsibilities in both official languages. Your Committee urges the Government to consider the advisability of adopting its recommendations.

PART ILANGUAGE OF WORK WITHIN THE PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA: HISTORICAL BACKGROUND AND DEFINITION*Pearson Statement (1966)

1. Before 1966, no general policy had been formulated respecting the use of official languages within the federal Public Service. On April 6, 1966, Prime Minister Pearson issued a statement of principle, which read in part as follows:

"The Government hopes and expects that, within a reasonable period of years, a state of affairs in the public service will be reached whereby . . . d) a climate will be created in which public servants from both language groups will work together toward common goals using their own language and applying their respective cultural values, but each fully understanding and appreciating those of the other."

2. As the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism later noted, the concept of "climate" mentioned in paragraph d) of this statement was not sufficiently developed to be perceived as an invitation to the public service to promote the aims of institutional bilingualism so as to create an environment for working in French.

Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism

Book I: Official Languages (1967)

3. Book I of the Final Report (a preliminary report was made public on February 1st, 1965) of the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission, published in October 1967, focussed on the status of the two official languages, English and French. Under the heading "Equal Partnership" the Commission stated in the blue pages of Book I that:

"Individual equality means essentially that everybody has the same access to the various benefits of a society without being hindered by his cultural identity. Thus, it is not enough for members of a minority group to have access to the same activities, institutions, and benefits as the members of the majority group; that simply requires an absence of discrimination against individuals as such. The equality to which we refer requires that a person who engages in some activity or associates with some institution need not renounce his own culture, but can offer his services, act, show his presence, develop and be accepted with all his cultural traits."¹

4. Within the framework of this principle and specifically with respect to the question of service to the public (the theme of the work world would be analysed in Book III), the Commission added that federal action should first be concerned with providing a wider legal basis for Canada's two official languages. The Commission went on to recommend the adoption of a federal Official Languages Act, one of the major aims of which would be to ensure that Canadian citizens have access to administrative and judicial services in the country's two official languages. This legislation was passed by the House of Commons and the Senate on July 7 and July 9, 1969 respectively, two months before the tabling on September 19, 1969 of Book III dealing with the work world.

Book III: The Work World (1969)

5. In the general introduction to Book III, the Commission raises the question of language of work and notes that:

"An individual should be free to work in the tongue in which he is most comfortable. Because he speaks one and not the other official language, he should not be unjustly penalized. In most fields, a 'career in French' should be as readily available as a 'career in English'. Thus, as a bilingual institution, the federal administration must contain organizational arrangements designed to ensure that individuals can work and develop professionally in their own language."²

6. To accomplish what had never before been accomplished, namely to implement a real policy and define concepts, the Commission based itself on the fundamental principles stated in the general introduction to Book I and, specifically, on the principle of equality of the two official languages. It should be noted that this principle constituted for the Commission the basic instrument of the policy envisaged for the federal administration. The Commission broadened the scope of this principle, which had served in Book I as a basis for all of its recommendations aimed at ensuring that the public can deal with the authorities in either of the two official languages anywhere in Canada, by adding that:

"linguistic and cultural discrimination between employees in the Public Service must be terminated, through reorganization to ensure the use of French at work. For the first time, the language rights of employees, as well as of clients, would be protected by the Public Service. It is also a huge task, since it involves changing the formal structure and intangible character and traditions of the Service as a whole. However, when broken down into sub-policies and mechanisms for their implementation, the task seems far less difficult and results less remote."³

7. The Commission therefore set down a guiding principle, one which, in short, established the right of each individual to work in either of Canada's two official languages. The Commission was aware that a fundamental structural reorganization was needed. To give expression to this principle, it made some twenty recommendations aimed at making French a functional language of work within the Public Service.

8. Among other things, the Commission recommended the creation of French-language work units (without which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, "there can be no equal partnership in the Federal Public Service"), the appointment of Francophones to high-level positions in the Public Service, auxiliary services with bilingual personnel or parallel sections and the availability in both official languages of documents and manuals for general use.

9. As we shall see, these recommendations are all tied to the organization, management and organizational reform of the Public Service. The Commission made no formal recommendation calling for the inclusion in the Official Languages Act of the principle whereby a public servant can work in the language of his choice. It recommended the creation of a Public Service Language Authority "as a means of establishing French as a language of work in the Public Service, according to the linguistic régime which we have outlined in this chapter". It also recommended that the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Official Languages be interpreted as including the language rights of public servants. Prime Minister Trudeau cleared up any misunderstanding when he stated in the House of Commons on January 12, 1970 that Book III did not "necessarily involve legislation to implement some of its recommendations".

Government response to Book III (1970)

10. On June 23, 1970, Prime Minister Trudeau announced in the House that he was "pleased to state that the government is able to accept in principle the broad objectives proposed for the public service by the Royal Commission. The general lines of these objectives are that the French language should increasingly become a language of work in the public service, that the atmosphere of the public service should represent the linguistic and cultural reality of Canadian society, and that Canadians whose mother tongue is French should be adequately represented in the public service—both in terms of numbers and in levels of responsibility".⁴

11. Furthermore, the Prime Minister informed the House of the Government's intention of setting up, on an experimental basis, French-language work units ("which would permit a better informed decision as to whether the system can be viable in the long term, to be taken by the government at a later date") and of its decision not to accept the Commission's recommendation to establish a Public Service Language Authority, since a new service with responsibility for co-ordinating implementation of the Government's official languages policy had been established in the Department of the Secretary of State in 1969.

12. Mr. Stanfield, for his part, declared: "This is a far-reaching matter. It is a matter that ought to be discussed in Parliament in such a way that the public which wishes to express its views could do so to a committee of the House."⁵

13. In short, the Official Languages Act came as a direct response to the recommendations contained in Book I of the Commission's Report and did not take into account other aspects of language reform (such as those emphasized in Book III of the Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which, in any event, did not call for amendments to the Act with respect to language of work.)

Parliamentary Resolution of 1973

14. In 1973, Parliament adopted a resolution stating the basic principles of the Government's program respecting official languages in the Public Service and containing other measures aimed at ensuring greater use of the French language in the Public Service. The Resolution recognized that

"public servants should, as a general proposition and subject to the requirements of the Official Languages Act respecting the provision of services to the public, be able to carry out their duties in the Public Service of Canada in the official language of their choice," and approved

"the taking of measures, after consultation with employee representatives, designed to produce a greater use of French at all levels in the Public Service, through increasing, where practical, the number of French Language Units, through further recruitment efforts by the Public Service Commission, . . . helping to realize the objective of achieving full participation in the Public Service by members of both the anglophone and francophone communities."

15. On May 31, 1973, Prime Minister Trudeau very clearly expressed his views by stating in the House during the debate on the Resolution that:

"We are not debating the Act; we are debating the public service official languages program . . . we want the public service to know what the guidelines are."⁶

16. The Government therefore chose to proceed by means of a resolution rather than pass legislation; the Resolution did not question the principles, but touched only on the practical aspects, the application and the implementation of these principles. To which the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Stanfield, replied in the House that:

"The adoption of this resolution—I emphasize this—is not binding on the government . . . One might argue, of course, that there would be some moral obligation on the part of the government to comply with the resolution, but there certainly could be no legal obligation on the part of the government, or officials administering the legislation, because this resolution cannot have the force of law, cannot change any existing law and cannot be binding upon those who are administering the law."⁷

17. The primary objective of this Resolution was therefore to define the special requirements of the program for public servants (safeguards were established) and to present several new and essential elements respecting application of the language program in the Public Service.

18. To some, the principles and safeguards contained in the Resolution represented a postponement of the Act's implementation and a slowdown in efforts to create a functionally bilingual Public Service. For others, the proposals shed light on the issue and provided the guarantees they wanted.

19. In short, the Resolution did not enable the House to express a new opinion or viewpoint on the Official Languages Act, but it did enable parliamentarians to speak out on the practical application of the idea that all Canadians should be able to work in the Public Service either in French or in English and on the principle safeguarding the right of any Canadian to remain unilingual while serving his country.

COURT DECISIONS ON LANGUAGE OF WORK

20. Over the years, a number of court decisions have had the effect of upsetting the previously flexible application and broad interpretation of the Act followed by the Commissioner of Official Languages. The debate has since that time moved onto the legal scene.

Serge Joyal et al v. Air Canada (1976)

21. This case involved a direct application for injunction made before the Quebec Superior Court by 41 French-speaking pilots for Air Canada and a Member of Parliament. The plaintiffs were seeking the repeal of Air Canada's policy on the use of French by its pilots.

22. Mr. Justice Deschênes received the application and issued an order of injunction against the Crown corporation ordering it to cease and desist from preventing its pilots from using French as a language of work on the flight deck (except when reasons of safety dictate the use of a language that is understood by all crew members) and in air-to-ground communications with Air Canada and Transport Canada ground stations. Judge Deschênes also ordered Air Canada to prepare a French terminology for all flight equipment used on the flight decks of its aircraft.

23. Judge Deschênes also confirmed in this decision a claim which the Commissioner of Official Languages had maintained for some time, namely that the expression "as to their use in . . ." contained in Section 2 of the Official Languages Act applies to language of work. He also stated that this section contains more than a simple principle and indicated that Air Canada was wrong in interpreting it merely as a declaratory provision rather than an executory one.

24. On February 16, 1982, Judge Deschênes's decision was reversed on appeal. Judge Monet, supported by Judge Nolan, ruled that the first instance judge had erred in finding Section 2 of the Official Languages Act executory rather than declaratory and stated that the Official Languages Act did not apply to the Aeronautics Act.

25. However, dissident Judge Barbès believed that the Minister of Transport is indeed bound by the terms of the Official Languages Act and that the Aeronautics Act and Regulations are not excluded from the application of its provisions.

Association des gens de l'air du Québec v. Minister of Transport (1977)

26. In this matter before the first instance division of the Federal Court of Canada, the plaintiffs disputed the validity of a Department of Transport order on standards and methods respecting aeronautical communications. This order which deals with the languages that can be used for oral communications in aeronautics authorizes the use of French for some types of communications while imposing the exclusive use of English in all other cases.

27. The plaintiffs asked that the order be repealed and that pilots and air controllers no longer be forbidden to use French in their work in Quebec. Their action was rejected.

28. Mr. Justice Marceau agreed with the Commissioner of Official Languages that Section 2 of the Act is in fact its "cornerstone" and that it is not merely wishful thinking or an abstract statement of principle devoid of any consequence but, in his view, "an introductory statement of the statute" whose consequences are found in Section 9 which sets out the duties and responsibilities of federal government departments, ministries and agencies. According to Judge Marceau, "the statute is declared . . . there is now an obligation to take the steps required to achieve the stated aim, even though the rate at which this will be done depends on what can be done." He used the expression found in Section 9 : "to the extent . . . feasible," to state that "nothing prevents gradual bilingualization".

29. To summarize, Judge Marceau did not find Section 2 of the Official Languages Act executory but rather that the provisions of the Act specify and limit the application of that section.

30. This judgement was appealed before the appeal division of the Federal Court, and the appeal was rejected unanimously in 1978 by Justices Pratte, Le Dain, and Hyde. Mr. Justice Pratte stated in this instance that the concept of official language as contained in Section 2 was rather imprecise.

"It refers to the language used by the government in its relations with the public. To say that English and French are official languages is simply to state that those two languages are those which are normally used in communications between citizens and the State."

Further on, the Judge noted that the equality proclaimed in Section 2 was in no way an absolute equality and that certain circumstances such as air safety could dictate both languages being treated differently.

31. Judge Le Dain, for his part, stated that Section 2 expressed the spirit of the Act, while Sections 9 and 10 set out the terms of implementation so that it could be an actual right and a practical reality. He also added that although Section 2 was more than an introductory provision and was in fact the only legal basis for the use of French and English by public servants, "the practical implementation required to make it into an actual right is another story altogether".

Serge Joyal and Hugo Tremblay v. Air Canada (1981)

32. Proceedings in this matter were instituted in 1977 when the plaintiffs complained of having to use English as a language of work and of the fact that all technical and non-technical work documents used by employees were written exclusively in English, including manuals, parts requisition forms, time cards, assembly sheets, etc.

33. The plaintiffs were mainly seeking an injunction ordering Air Canada to stop preventing its employees whose mother tongue is French from using French as a language of work in the Maintenance Branch and the Purchasing and Facilities Branch. They also asked that the defendant prepare or translate into French all technical and non-technical documents that would be used for work purposes.

34. Mr. Justice Legault rendered his decision on May 25, 1981 and stated that Section 2 was a lot more than a statement of intent on the legislator's part. "Under the said Act, Section 2 is declaratory and executory." However, Judge Legault said that he was not in a position to grant the injunction ("only the Governor in Council can take executory measures") and opted for a declaratory ruling stating that Air Canada would have to have completed, by the end of 1983, the implementation of all the progressive measures announced by its president, Claude Taylor, to consider itself bilingual in its shops; otherwise, it would be putting itself in a position of "voluntary violation" of the Official Languages Act.

THE NEED TO AMEND THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

To include the principle of language of work

35. As we see from the preceding historical background, some confusion exists about the exact scope of the Official Languages Act and more specifically, about Section 2, which reads as follows:

Declaration of status of languages

Section 2

"The English and French languages are the official languages of Canada for all purposes of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and possess and enjoy equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada."

36. Mr. Justice Deschênes, when he addressed this subject, interpreted the expression "as to their use in" contained in Section 2 as encompassing the question of language of work. Moreover, it was on the basis of this same expression that the Commissioner was able, even before the adoption of the Parliamentary Resolution in 1973, to examine and make recommendations pertaining to the language of work régime within the Public Service. This interpretation will not necessarily be upheld ad infinitum before the courts.

37. In his 1971-72 annual report, the Commissioner himself mentioned that his interpretation had hardly been shouted from the rooftops by the federal government. Although the use of a language in the workplace has been an objective of language reform since the Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 and, in this sense, the Commissioner is fully justified in acting in this area, in our view he currently has no solid legislative and juridical basis which he can use for the purpose of safeguarding the language rights of public servants. We believe it is doubtful and perhaps risky to have this entire issue rest on the words "as to their use in" contained in Section 2 of the Act.

38. It should be mentioned that on October 17, 1968, during the first reading debate on the legislation in question, Mr. Trudeau stated, in reference to this point, that:

"(The Act) does not regulate the internal operations of the government—an important matter, as I have said, and one which has evolved in many ways. There are other statutes and there are policy statements which deal with such matters as internal operations of the government. They also deal with matters having to do with communications between the government and an employee and deal with other areas where the question of bilingualism is a factor in employment."⁸

39. The Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 did not confirm this, but rather enabled parliamentarians to state for the first time that language of work would henceforth be one of the objectives of the Government in terms of its "internal administration" in the area of official languages. At no time during the debate in the House was there any mention of the fact that the language of work principle was now another objective with a legal basis similar to the one established in the Act itself as regards service to the public. The Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 did not change the Official Languages Act. It is not perceived as having force of law.

40. It is now time to recognize expressly the rights of choice of language of work on the same basis as the rights relating to service to the public. In this way, future judicial interpretations may well avoid producing confusing and ambiguous situations.

41. Even if the new Charter of Rights contained in the Canadian Constitution gives precedence to language rights over the provisions of any other legislation, it may well be interpreted as doing so only with regard to those constitutional language provisions contained in the Charter itself, which appear to relate only to service to the public and not to language of work. But even if the language of work question were deemed to be covered by the Charter of Rights, judicial disputes could only be heard by reference to the Charter, and not to the Official Languages Act: in other words, by contesting the constitutionality of a law deemed not to be in compliance with the principle of linguistic equality as stated in the Charter of Rights. In our view, therefore, it is also necessary to provide for rights and recourse within the framework of the Official Languages Act itself so that this Act may truly become a charter of fundamental language rights.

42. In our opinion, it is essential that the principle mentioned in the Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 be legally recognized in the Act in order to clarify the scope of Section 2.

43. Consequently, we recommend:

"That the Official Languages Act be amended so as to include a section stipulating that employees of federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations should, subject to the requirements of the Official Languages Act respecting the provision of service to the public, be able to carry out their duties in the official language of their choice."

To stress the primacy and executory nature of the Act

44. The mere fact of incorporating into the Act a section stipulating that French and English are the languages of work in the institutions of Parliament and the Government of Canada does not resolve all of the problems. Quite the contrary. The whole legal debate has centred on two other aspects:

a) can the Official Languages Act require implementation of the principles and provisions it contains and b) in the event of a difference between the Official Languages Act and another federal act or regulation, does the Official Languages Act take precedence?

45. Most of the Judges called upon to rule on the question have perceived Section 2 as being declaratory in nature. In their view, the Act does not create executory rights, rights which a party can seek to have enforced through judicial process. Currently, authority for monitoring compliance with the Official Languages Act lies with the Commissioner, who merely has the power of recommendation.

46. To some, this question is resolved by the provisions respecting guaranteed rights and freedoms (Charter of Rights) entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. Now that the Charter is enshrined in the Constitution, it will make inoperable any provision of other laws incompatible with it. Section 16 (1) of the Charter of Rights is almost an exact repetition of Section 2 of the Official Languages Act:

Section 16 (1)

"English and French are the official languages of Canada and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada."

47. Others do not share this opinion and claim that the Official Languages Act will always remain the tool with which the courts will attempt to elucidate the spirit and intent of the legislator. Owing to the lack of specific detail in the Official Languages Act, the courts will be able to do no more than underline the very general nature of Section 16 (1) of the Canadian Constitution. This section entrenches the equality of the two official languages but the means by which this principle is applied will still have to be viewed in the context of the Official Languages Act in instances where the Charter is non-explicit.

48. The Deputy Minister of Justice himself stated before our Committee that Section 16 does not confer absolute rights and is subject to interpretation. He stated that a section on precedence included in the Official Languages Act would clearly affirm that all provisions of the Act would take precedence over any act of Parliament. We also noted during this meeting that the enforcement provisions of Section 24 of the Charter of Rights leave a great deal of room for discretion by the courts. It is not explicitly stated that enforcements of an "executory" nature will be possible in order to force the government to respect the rights and principles set out in the Charter of Rights or in the Official Languages Act. We would like to clarify this aspect given that the wording of Section 24 of the Act is vague and prevents us from predicting how the courts will interpret it.

49. Committee members are convinced of the need to ward off any attack on the principle of equal partnership contained in Section 2 of the Official Languages Act, the cornerstone of that Act. At present, the Act does not override ordinary legislation and therefore can be easily undermined, as several court decisions over the years have shown. The Committee feels it is important to avoid any ambiguity and to make the equality of the two official languages a principle having legal implications of both a "declaratory" and "executory" nature, a principle that supersedes any other law, order, rule or regulation.

50. We do believe, however, that particular circumstances may justify derogation from this principle. By inserting a "notwithstanding" type of clause, Parliament would be able to go outside the Act but would have to explain and defend its position whenever it deemed that federal legislative or regulatory provisions should not be subject to the application of the Official Languages Act. Each time Parliament adopts an Act that does not contain the expression "notwithstanding the Official Languages Act", the latter will automatically take precedence.

51. Consequently, we recommend:

"That Section 2 of the Official Languages Act be amended so as to establish the declaratory and executory nature of the Act."

52. "That the Official Languages Act be amended so as to include a provision whereby every law of Canada, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of Parliament to operate notwithstanding the Official Languages Act, shall be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe the rule set forth in Section 2."

53. "That Section 36(1) of the Official Languages Act be amended so as to include the following definition: 'law of Canada' means any Act of the Parliament of Canada, enacted before or after the coming into force of this Act, any order, rule or regulation thereunder, and any law in force in Canada or in any part of Canada at the commencement of this Act that is subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada."

54. "That all acts, orders, rules and regulations or any of their provisions in force at the present time which fall within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and which are inconsistent with the Official Languages Act or Sections 16 to 20 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms be modified as soon as possible in order to comply with the principles and provisions of the aforementioned Act and Charter."

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE LANGUAGE OF WORK REGIME

55. As a result of the Parliamentary Resolution (which confirms language of work as one of the fundamental principles of the government program respecting official languages in the Public Service), Treasury Board issued in 1973 a directive which provided that in certain parts of Canada, outside French and English regions of the country, employees can be supervised and have access to central services in both official languages. These geographic areas, henceforth to be known as bilingual regions, included the National Capital Region, certain parts of Montreal and Quebec, northern and eastern Ontario and northern and eastern New Brunswick. They were selected in part because the purpose was to have the internal administration of the federal Public Service reflect the fact that the use of the two official languages is rather generalized in government offices and the surrounding communities of these areas.

56. Four years later, in September 1977, Treasury Board issued a policy statement (Circular 1977-46) in which it defined more specifically language use in the internal government administration as well as the rights of employees regarding language use. The statement enumerated services for which the use of the two official languages is required in the internal administration of the government as well as specific criteria for identifying the language requirements of each position. A summary of each public servant's rights and obligations respecting language use was also included.

57. Furthermore, this policy statement established more clearly the bilingual regions of 1973 by providing details about the counties and cities which comprise these regions. The Province of New Brunswick became a bilingual region as did the central offices of agencies and departments located outside the National Capital Region.

58. In September 1977, the Government also issued a document entitled "Revised Official Languages Policies in the Public Service of Canada," enabling it to make adjustments to its policies and methods of implementation. This policy statement confirmed existing provisions (support measures) designed to facilitate the choice of language of work. Among other things, these provisions deal with personnel services, central services, supervision, positions in the executive category, languages used at meetings, availability of work instruments and professional training and development in both official languages. The policy also provides for greater use of French unilingual positions to provide Francophones with more opportunities to work in French.

59. Since 1977, departments are supposed to have adopted and implemented plans and programs with a view to enabling employees to work in the language of their choice. Such plans and programs are included in the official languages plan that each department submits annually to Treasury Board.

60. The Commissioner of Official Languages stated before our Committee on November 3, 1981 that this set of principles and guidelines "has not brought about to any great extent [the] new and more satisfactory patterns of language use all of us would like to see established". Below, we shall analyse the situation regarding language use within those departments and agencies that appeared before our Committee, but at this point we should like to point out the status of what the Commissioner refers to as the "theoretical aspects" of the question: the Treasury Board guidelines.

61. In our view, this set of guidelines does not meet the commitment made by the Government when the Parliamentary Resolution was adopted in 1973, namely the concrete, succinct formulation of policies clearly informing public servants of their rights and obligations. Moreover, Treasury Board has never undertaken an overall, in-depth study of the question of language of work. It has "concentrated" its efforts more on statistical studies on the use of official languages in bilingual regions.

62. In our opinion, such an overall study should be undertaken as soon as possible and we feel that the Commissioner of Official Languages is the person best qualified to take on this task. Among other things, the study could focus on the infrastructure set up by Treasury Board to promote the free choice of language of work for public servants. The country has been divided into bilingual and unilingual regions by Treasury Board. Departments did not question this decision when they appeared before our Committee. We understand that the universal application of the principle of the free choice of language of work may well be an unrealistic objective, but we would like to see a study carried out to determine whether the current approach is too rigid or restrictive or, conversely, too generous, thus giving public servants unrealistic expectations.

63. As we pointed out in our first report, we believe that regulations having force of law should be adopted under Section 35 of the Official Languages Act. Bilingual regions and administrative support services should be subject to regulation by the Governor-in-Council upon recommendation by the Commissioner of Official Languages when he has completed the study that we are suggesting he carry out.

64. Consequently, we recommend:

"That the Commissioner of Official Languages undertake as soon as possible an in-depth study on the principles, the guidelines and the government programmes with respect to language of work."

65. "That regions designated for language of work purposes and administrative support services enabling public servants to work in the official language of their choice be determined by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Official Languages, following his study, and that regulations to this effect be adopted pursuant to Section 35 of the Official Languages Act."

66. "That Treasury Board subsequently undertake a process to reform, simplify and update its guidelines respecting language of work."

PART II

USE OF FRENCH AND ENGLISH AS LANGUAGES OF WORK IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Treasury Board Studies

67. Departments are still more or less in the dark on how to apply the overall language of work policy, which does not seek to govern the use of languages in a sweeping and uniform manner, and which does not include specific measures. On the contrary, this policy provides that use of the languages may vary according to region, functions of the agencies and even individuals.

68. In what proportion and according to what terms and conditions are the two official languages used by Anglophone and Francophone public servants in the Public Service of Canada? At present, the answers to these questions remain vague and incomplete owing to the absence of recent general studies in this area. Also, no existing evaluation model can take into account the complexity of the use of languages in a given workplace, owing to the fluid and highly interdependent nature of the phenomena in question. Few departments have fundamentally analysed their use of French as a language of work.

69. The Official Languages Branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat is currently conducting two types of studies on the use of official languages in federal departments and institutions. One is an audit of the language of work situation based on a sample of approximately ten departments. The other is an update of its study of the use of the two official languages in the bilingual regions of the Public Service conducted in 1978-79 and published in March 1980.

70. The 1978-79 study revealed that, for all the bilingual regions combined, French-speakers comprised 45% of staff, and French was used 31.5% and English 68.5% of the time. However, the use of English and French varied according to the first official language of public servants: on average, English-speakers used English 91.9% of the time, while French-speakers used French 59.9% of the time. The study also revealed considerable variations in the exclusive use of the first language at work: more than half of the English-speakers (55.6%) used only English at work, while 12.1% of French-speakers worked exclusively in French. Other noticeable variations were found in different regions. In Quebec, French-speaking public servants used French three times more often than English, and their English-speaking colleagues used French almost as often as English. On the other hand, English remains the principal language of work in federal offices in New Brunswick. In Ontario's bilingual regions, English-speaking public servants use English almost exclusively while their French-speaking counterparts use French less than half the time. Finally, the study showed that individual French-speakers made greater use of the second language, hence less use of their first language, than did English-speakers in bilingual and French and English essential positions.

Units Working in French

71. In response to the recommendations of the 1970 Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the Government decided to establish French-language units on a trial basis in order to determine whether the use of these units was a valid long-term concept for organization and management. French is the principal language of work in these units, which are composed of a group of French essential positions and a minimal number of bilingual positions, where necessary. In 1975, convinced of this concept's value, the Government issued a Treasury Board circular urging departments to create such units in the National Capital Region. The revised official languages policies of autumn 1977 retained the concept of units working mainly in French, but specified that departments should decide on locations where such units would be an appropriate means of encouraging greater use of French as a language of work.

72. Departments do not agree on the usefulness of French-language work units. Some have stated that they see these units as a practical means of ensuring that French-speaking Canadians can exercise their right to work in their language; others, particularly scientific institutions such as the National Research Council and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, create such units in order to better establish themselves in a Francophone milieu. Still other institutions stated that they hesitated to create French-language work units because these units tend to reduce the mobility of people working in them.

73. Invited by the Committee to express his view on the units-working-in-French experiment, the Commissioner of Official Languages replied that he felt that in Quebec the experiment had given very positive results in that, before such units were established, there had been a general tendency to correspond with Ottawa in English. Even if the Quebec section of a department was almost totally French-speaking, usage dictated that correspondence with Ottawa would be in English and that Ottawa send out directives in English. However, since the units-working-in-French system required that all communications with these units be in French, it was possible to create a much healthier situation. In his opinion, units working in French in the National Capital Region were much less successful. In many cases the concept was somewhat artificial in that branches which were already working in French were officially designated as units working in French. Thus, there was no difference except on paper.

74. To the extent that government departments and institutions establish autonomous administrative structures that work mainly in French, they help to increase the proportion of French essential positions, thereby increasing employees' opportunities to use French at work.

75. Since it has been demonstrated that units working in French encourage the use of French as a language of work, we recommend:

"That efforts be continued to establish such units in departments and agencies of the federal government."

Equitable participation and language of work

76. The Committee examined this issue and recognized that the principle of the full participation of the two official language groups is an important element in the achievement of the two other major official language policy objectives within the federal Public Service, namely the provision of bilingual services and the right of public servants to work in the official language of their choice. This principle was given concrete expression in the Parliamentary Resolution of 1973 and clearly recognized four years later in 1977 in the government statement on a national official languages policy entitled "A National Understanding". The Government stated in this policy paper that:

"The two official language groups should participate equitably in the federal institutions of government."⁹

The Committee believes that this principle should also be formally recognized in the Act in order to give it legal status.

77. Consequently, we recommend:

"That the Official Languages Act be amended so as to include a section stipulating that Canada's two official language groups shall be equitably represented in, and at all levels of, the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada."

78. There is both a quantitative and qualitative aspect to the principle of the full participation of the two official language groups. The quantitative aspect corresponds to the balanced representation of the two official language groups, whereas the qualitative aspect ensures that the working environment enables both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians to develop their maximum career potential while working in their own language.

79. A language will not actually be used in a given environment unless a certain number of people speak that language; conversely, only constant use can create an environment that is likely to attract candidates of the language group in question.

80. At first glance, it appears that most departments and institutions with a low percentage of French-speakers have not yet managed, in any noticeable way, to establish French as a language of work. On the other hand, in departments with a high concentration of French-speakers, French has really found its place as a language of work. The Committee noted, however, that in certain departments where Francophone representation has attained or exceeded 25%, French is still used all too rarely as a language of work. Nevertheless, in the critical category of upper management the Committee did note a definite shortage of French speakers. We are convinced that this situation has a deleterious effect on the status of French in a department, and consequently on the implementation of the Act. The key to success therefore does not seem to lie merely in having a "critical" overall number, but rather in combining a balanced concentration in the various occupational categories with a working climate and conditions that encourage the establishment of French as a language of work.

81. The problem is especially acute in scientific departments where Francophone participation in the scientific and professional and technical categories must be ensured if French is to have any vitality. Less than 20% of staff in the technical and scientific and professional categories are Francophone. Efforts to recruit Francophone technicians and professionals must therefore be intensified over the next few years.

82. On the other hand, we noted the existence of a French language polarization in Quebec and an English language polarization in the other provinces within the federal Public Service. As early as December 1980, in a special study on the participation of English-speaking public servants in Quebec federal institutions, the Commissioner of Official Languages stated: "Anglophone participation in the Public Service, that is to say, those institutions subject to the Public Service Employment Act, is poor in Quebec, outside the National Capital Region; however, it remains strong in other areas of federal employment, such as Crown corporations". During our Committee hearings, we also realized that Francophones are not equitably represented within federal departments and agencies.

83. Currently, central agency guidelines on equitable participation are vague and general and offer little in the way of concrete guidance to departments and agencies of government. We therefore recommend:

"That the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Public Service Commission develop clearer guidelines designed to help individual departments and agencies set appropriate participation targets for both official language groups in order to rectify certain imbalances in representation and thereby move more quickly toward achieving the Parliament's objective of equitable participation."

84. Furthermore, we recommend:

"That each department, agency or Crown corporation undertake a detailed analysis of the participation of the two official language groups within its own ranks, and take the necessary steps to correct any imbalance of a linguistic group being poorly represented either in an occupational category, or at a working level, or in a given geographic region."

Difficulties in Making French a Genuine Language of Work

85. Although a number of departments have taken interesting initiatives in an effort to stimulate the use of French as a language of work (inter-regional exchange programs, simultaneous drafting in both languages, language training geared to the requirements of the workplace, the presence within work units of revisers, the designation of one day per week as a French day, etc.), English remains the dominant language in departments and agencies of the federal government.

86. The testimony of witnesses before our Committee indicated that most internal and inter-departmental management meetings take place in English only. If the opportunity to use the language of one's choice during such meetings can be considered an indicator of the extent to which functional bilingualism has advanced within an institution, then language reform in terms of language of work is certainly not well advanced. The alternative, the use of simultaneous interpretation, is practiced by very few departments because of the high costs involved.

87. It also became clear that few departments have managed to respect the Treasury Board's directives relating to internal communications between offices located in the National Capital Region and those located in bilingual regions. In a number of departments, such communications still take place too often in English. For example, written communications are often conducted in English and are accompanied by the message "French to follow". The directives nevertheless state that communications between offices in the National Capital Region and those located in unilingual regions in Quebec should take place in French, whereas those between Ottawa and offices located in other bilingual regions may take place in either of the official languages.

88. The Commissioner of Official Languages noted before our Committee that many anglophone officers do not use their French (which they have often acquired through government language schools) because they consider that it is not necessary to do so or because they find that they can manage without doing so. The result is that many do not make any particular effort to deal with their Francophone employees in French and do not try to encourage Francophones to write and speak French. In addition, either because they do not have the opportunity to use their second language or because they are not motivated to do so, many Anglophones have difficulty maintaining and developing their second language skills even after they have mastered a certain level of French.

89. Like many observers of the official languages situation within the federal Public Service, we are convinced that noticeable progress toward giving French equal status as a language of work cannot take place without a serious commitment on the part of senior management. There is no doubt that senior managers have an influence on the personal behaviour of their employees. However, the same senior managers very often have only a limited ability to work in French, to use documents drafted in French and to transmit their decisions in that language.

90. Although the Committee noted a sincere commitment on the part of a number of senior managers to improve the use of both official languages within their departments and agencies, that commitment did not always appear to have obvious repercussions on the daily activities of the institution. Certain witnesses stated that acceptance of language reform still met with some resistance or resentment at certain levels of the organization.

91. Consequently, we recommend:

"That the Treasury Board inform all departments of its expectations with respect to the implementation by managers of departmental official languages policies and explain in clearer terms the consequences that poor administrative practices in this area may have on the annual performance evaluation of managers".

Evaluation of Departments' Linguistic Performance

92. The language régime outlined in the 1977 revised official languages policies requires federal departments and agencies to provide their employees in bilingual regions with a certain number of services in both official languages. These services include personal services (pay, medical services, library and information services), central services (accounting, administrative, financial and budgetary services), supervision and written material (work instruments, manuals, guidelines, etc.). Employees must also be given the opportunity to receive professional training and development in the language of their choice and to participate in meetings using their first official language.

93. All these essential elements constitute, what may be called the backdrop for the language régime in the language of work area. To see to what extent both languages are being used at work, all one has to do is study each of these aspects and see how departments carry out their responsibilities. On the question of work instruments, for example, testimony indicated that few departments can boast of providing their employees with all the work instruments they need to perform their duties in the language of their choice. Reasons given for this are delays caused by translation, the urgency of a particular situation, or difficulties in translating extremely complex documents in scientific and technical fields. Some witnesses told the Committee that translating some documents was of no use since, when the translation was finally ready, the documents in question were already out of date.

94. The Committee was also able to establish that the right of employees to be supervised in the language of their choice was often not respected. In most departments and agencies called before the Committee, there are still too many supervisors who do not meet the language requirements of their position or who are simply not bilingual. This situation cannot continue without compromising the efforts of departments to establish French as a language of work. We noted that, in general, there are too few training and development courses offered in French as compared with the number offered in English. In terms of the availability in both official languages of personal and central services, the situation varies considerably from one department to another. In some departments, some or all of these services are actively offered in both official languages. In others, however, they are offered in both official languages only upon request. Still other departments and agencies offer such services only in English.

95. We became aware of the fact that very few federal departments and agencies can say beyond doubt that they respect their obligations in each and every one of these areas. The reason for this state of affairs is very simple: in a number of departments, there is no formal supervisory and evaluation mechanism that can systematically control the degree to which departmental plans are implemented and policy requirements for the department as a whole met.

96. Consequently, we recommend:

"That all federal departments and agencies establish supervisory and evaluation mechanisms to provide systematic control over the degree to which departmental plans are implemented and policy requirements met, and that a report on such mechanisms be included in the annual plans they submit to Treasury Board."

Imperative Staffing for Language of Work Purposes

97. In its first report, on language of service, the Committee dealt with the issue of imperative staffing and recommended "that the December 31, 1983 deadline be re-established after which there should be no further conditional appointments". Subsequently, a number of witnesses commented upon this recommendation before our Committee. For example, one of the Public Service unions stated that the December 31, 1983 deadline was unrealistic, but added that "if we could have an honest designation system, we would be prepared to support imperative staffing".

98. On December 8, 1981, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission stated before our Committee:

"In the case of bilingual positions, if we add up the number of positions staffed imperatively and those staffed non-imperatively, we find that 75 per cent of these individuals meet the language requirements of the position at the time of their appointment. Three-quarters of all people appointed to bilingual positions meet the requirements of their position at the time they are appointed."

99. In light of this statement, the Committee believes that the recommendation on imperative staffing contained in its first report is not only defensible but essential for positions designated bilingual for language of work purposes. For example, it was frequently brought to the Committee's attention that employees in supervisory positions are those who least meet the language requirements of their position. Furthermore, since the Chairman of the Public Service Commission was able to state in December 1981 that 75% of all appointees to bilingual positions already met the language requirements of their position at the time of their appointment, we presume that percentage will increase considerably during the two-year period ending on December 31, 1983.

100. We nevertheless recognize that, in exceptional situations, there may be justification for continuing the system of conditional appointments beyond December 31, 1983. In our opinion, however, the general rule should always be in favour of imperative staffing and exceptions should be defined and justified by the Treasury Board in cooperation with the Public Service Commission.

We therefore recommend:

101. "That December 31, 1983 be re-established as the date beyond which conditional appointments should no longer take place".

102. "That the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission define and justify the exceptional situations in which conditional appointments may continue beyond December 31, 1983, and that these agencies take the necessary steps to eliminate such exceptional situations as soon as possible."

CONCLUSION

103. In tabling this, its fourth report, the Committee has completed its general analysis of the three major elements of language reform: service to the public, language of work and equitable participation. We do not consider our examination of these questions as final, but when we return to matters related to these three aspects, it will be in the context of a study of specific issues.

104. In the fall, the Committee hopes to visit locations in Canada in order to broaden its experience by meeting with individuals and groups interested in language reform. The Committee will thus be able to gain a better understanding of the situation and of the state of language reform since adoption of the Official Languages Act in 1969 and the Parliamentary Resolution in 1973.

THE SENATE

Monday, July 5, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Guy Williams presented Bill S-28, establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill reads as follows:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as the Indian-Inuit Week Act.
2. Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the week beginning on Monday, Victoria Day, shall be kept and observed as "Indian-Inuit Week", and Sunday, the last day of Indian-Inuit Week, shall be kept and observed as "Inuit-Indian Day".

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Williams, it isn't necessary to read the whole bill.

Senator Williams: There is just one more clause, Mr. Speaker.

3. Indian-Inuit Week may also be called "Indian Week" or "Inuit Week", and Inuit-Indian Day may also be called "Inuit Day" or "Indian Day".

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Williams, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY MONITORING BILL

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, Bill C-106, which, when enacted, will bear the title "Energy Monitoring Act", provides, among other things, for the obtaining by the minister, or by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, of a wide range of information on a confidential basis.

Clause 36 of the bill provides:

- (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the Minister may disclose any statistic, information or documentation obtained under this Act where he considers the disclosure to be in the public interest, taking into account the competitive position of the individual, corporation, partnership, trust, organization or association of persons affected by the disclosure.

Honourable senators will note that this clause provides that the minister may disclose any statistic, information, or documentation so obtained where he considers the disclosure to be in the public interest, taking into account the competitive position of the supplier of the information who may be affected by the disclosure, and provides that where the minister proposes to make such disclosure, in a form that identifies the supplier of the information, the minister must notify such supplier and afford it a reasonable opportunity to make representations with respect to the effect the disclosure might have on its competitive position.

Questions were raised in the committee with regard to clause 36 permitting the disclosure of information obtained on a confidential basis. That disclosure is, of course, predicated on believing that it is in the public interest to do so. The minister is authorized to do this only in the public interest.

The committee concluded that the minister is accountable to Parliament for the decision as to what is in the public interest, and that Parliament is the appropriate authority to determine the proper use of the discretion lying in the words "in the public interest". Because of the continued concern of your committee, however, as to the exercise of this authority to disclose information, the minister did undertake that he would return to this committee to account for his actions if he exercised the power under this clause.

The committee accepted the commitment of the minister, and agreed to report the bill without amendment.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Monday, July 5, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-106, intituled: "An Act respecting energy monitoring and to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Wednesday, June 2, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. McILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Peter Bosa moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLE FUEL CONSUMPTION STANDARDS BILL

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, Bill C-107, respecting motor vehicle fuel consumption standards, contains a similar type of provision with regard to disclosure. A similar point was raised in connection with that bill, and I do not need to repeat it here.

In addition, this bill contains a provision to the effect that the minister is required to report to Parliament as soon as possible after the end of each year. When your committee took objection to this rather general term, which, regrettably, is rather common in legislation, the minister undertook to take the matter up with the Department of Justice, and to have this clause examined by them with a view to amending it, possibly through a miscellaneous statute law amendment act, at the earliest opportunity, to the effect that the report will be prepared within three months of the end of the year, and be tabled within 15 sitting days thereafter.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Monday, July 5, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-107, intituled: "An Act respecting motor vehicle fuel consumption standards", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Tuesday, June 15, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. McILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

● (2010)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Riel, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator McIlraith,]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, when Bill C-103, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act, was before the committee concern was expressed by the Coal Association of Canada concerning the definition of "oil" and "oil product" in the bill. It expressed the fear that coal that had been processed prior to selling it as coal would come under all of the provisions of the act. There was considerable discussion on that point, and the minister pointed out that coal was specifically excluded from the definition of oil or oil products.

In order to make it clear to the coal industry that it was a matter that need not occupy their attention, and to alleviate their concern, he gave a specific commitment that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources would consult the industry before initiating any action to designate any product of the processing of coal as an oil product within the meaning of the act. It is visualized that products such as methanol, liquid gasoline or gas would be designated, but not coal itself.

The Air Transport Association of Canada made representations to the committee to the effect that the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge levied on exported aviation fuel between May 1981 and January 1982 should be refunded to Canadian international carriers.

The government reviewed the situation and the minister, when he was before the committee, announced that the government had decided to accede to the association's request and, with regard to refund, would treat Canadian carriers in the same manner as foreign carriers were being treated. That was in accordance with the views of the committee. That can be done without legislative action. It does not involve any amendment or any other legislative procedure.

● (2015)

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Being a junior senator, I am asking him, a much more experienced senator, for clarification on a particular point. What is the exact meaning of the so-called "commitment from the minister"? The acting chairman of the committee has just indicated that he has received a commitment from the minister. I want to know the status of such a commitment in terms of its practical application to legislation.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I shall try to be brief in my answer, although it may require further discussion. The simple answer to the honourable senator's question is that legally a commitment from a minister has no effect whatever. What does have effect is the formal report, that the bill is reported without amendment. However, as a matter of experience, commitments from ministers is a technique developed by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and, I must say, it has been remarkably effective and successful.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): More or less.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Which is it, "more" or "less"?

Senator McIlraith: I do not agree that it is more or less. I can think of only one instance when such a commitment was not effective.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Flynn is becoming a little cynical.

Senator Flynn: No, he is.

Senator McIlraith: There is a practical application in all this. For instance, holding up an important bill by sending it back to the other place for amendment, at this late stage in the session, to replace a clause stating, for example, "provided the minister shall report as soon as possible after the end of the year," would, I think, go against the wishes of most senators. All I can say is that such commitments do work.

Senator Tremblay: If I understand the honourable senator's words correctly, when a commitment is given by a minister to a Senate committee and is subsequently included in the legislation, it has a practical effect. But when there is no amendment to, or modification of, the legislation, the commitment is just a pious vow. Do Senate committees normally rely on such a commitment—

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Tremblay: —even when the legislation is not correct, in their perception?

Senator Perrault: There is an element of trust involved here.

Senator McIlraith: Because of the magnitude and wide range of the legislation that comes before the committee, it must make a decision as to whether or not it is going to risk delaying the passage of a bill for the sake of correcting or improving a lesser provision of the bill. It is a choice the committee has to make. Certainly, it is a choice I personally dislike having to make, although it is a choice I have no hesitation in making—

Senator Flynn: But you are the majority.

Senator McIlraith: —simply because, from past experience, such a commitment has been fulfilled in almost all cases.

● (2020)

Senator Tremblay: When a government has lost the confidence of the people, what is the worth of that commitment?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Resign! They are forced to resign.

Senator Perrault: That is a rhetorical question.

Senator Marshall: Take it as notice.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Monday, July 5, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-103, intituled: "An Act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and to enact provisions related thereto", has, in obedience to the Order of reference of Monday, June 21, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. MCILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, but he is still in the northern—

Hon. C. William Doody: He is still hiding.

Senator Flynn: Scandinavian countries.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It had been hoped that the Honourable Senator Olson would be present this evening. I understand that he is in transit, rushing back to Ottawa to answer questions posed by members of the opposition and to perform other important duties.

Senator Flynn: He has not yet recovered from the budget.

Hon. David Walker: Whether he is here or not is a matter of no importance. We have seldom received any worthwhile information from him, in any event.

THE BUDGET

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to certain questions asked relating to the budget.

The Department of Finance has given a good deal of consideration to the questions posed by honourable senators in recent days. Those questions were asked by the Honourable Senators Asselin, Murray, Donahoe, Smith and Roblin. I should, first of all, like to deal with the questions posed by the Honourable Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin asked how much the government will be paying in interest on the government's current deficit.

This depends on interest rates prevailing in capital markets during the year and on the type of debt instruments issued by the government.

The narrow question regarding interest payments on the current deficit is not clear. In the budget papers, however, public debt charges—interest payments on the total outstanding debt—are now expected to reach some $17.9 billion in 1982-83. The rise from $15.1 billion in 1981-82 reflects the need to finance the 1982-83 deficit, plus some roll-over of existing debt at higher interest rates.

IMPACT ON INTEREST RATES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Asselin also asked a question regarding interest rates. He asked whether interest rates would fall in the near future, and whether there were measures in the budget to bring down interest rates. That question is found at page 4460 of Debates of the Senate.

High Canadian interest rates are largely attributable to two factors: the high level of U.S. interest rates and the high rate of domestic inflation.

While an easing of U.S. interest rates will reduce the upward pressure on Canadian rates, the underlying problem in Canada remains inflation. Given that interest rates must exceed the rate of inflation, if savers are to get any net return and if borrowers are to experience any net cost, only a decline in inflation can lead to a lasting reduction in the level of interest rates. The major thrust of the budget, of course, is a reduction in inflation.

● (2025)

The budget provides an action plan directed at lowering inflation and, hence, interest rates. The plan includes the public sector compensation restraint program, from which the government hopes the provinces and the private sector will take their lead, and the ongoing review of federally administered prices and measures to improve confidence, investment and productivity in the business sector. New spending initiatives are to be funded, out of savings achieved largely through cutbacks and limits on indexation factors.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING—INFLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Asselin continued his line of questioning by asking whether it has occurred to the government that to lower inflation it should first lower its own spending.

The budget restated its commitment to limit the trend rate of increase in its spending to the trend rate of increase in gross national product. A number of factors have combined to push up spending relative to GNP this year. The depth of the current recession itself has lowered the expected rate of growth of GNP and has pushed up spending on items such as unemployment insurance payments. A $1.1 billion deferral of certain energy-related expenditure items from 1981-82 to 1982-83 has also acted to push up spending this year.

The increase in spending and the decline in revenues associated with the recession have combined to result in a large increase in the deficit projection for 1982-83. Under the current circumstances, with the economy in recession and with the personal savings rate at a very high level, the deficit is probably not having a significant impact on interest rates or inflation.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, come on!

Hon. Martial Asselin: Who drafted that?

Senator Perrault: I regret the cynical remarks from the other side.

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE AND TAXATION OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): As reported at page 4463, Senator Murray asked whether the November budget measures on capital cost allowance and the taxation of employee benefits are still being put forward by the government. The answer is: Yes. The Minister of National Revenue, the Honourable William Rompkey, announced certain exemptions from the employee benefits rules in March. There were also some minor revisions to the CCA provisions.

APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY GROUP

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Donohoe asked whether the proposed tax increases are to be subjected to the same "so-called"—to use his words—blue ribbon panel as the proposed expenditures to promote investment.

The proposed two-year limited indexation of the personal income tax system and specific transfers will not be referred to the committee.

Senator Donahoe asked a further question as to whether the Minister of Finance has any alternatives to consider in the event that the blue ribbon panel rejects his proposals.

The proposed measures, when implemented, will improve an important source of distortion in the tax system and help restore appropriate incentives in certain investment areas. The measures were discussed during the consultations exercise and are high on the list of business priorities. A rejection of the proposals is not expected, although amendments, counter-proposals and further discussions will be required.

Senator Donahoe asked whether the green paper envisaged budget announcements on possible policies followed by consultations, or did it suggest consultations to be followed by a budget.

The green paper dealt with pre-budget consultations. Although the proposals were introduced with the budget, they will still be a focus of discussion in the period leading up to the next regular budget.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): This is an irregular budget we have now.

Senator Perrault: Among several questions Senator Donahoe asked the other day, he asked whether there will be a new budget in the fall.

Senator Flynn: A regular budget.

Senator Perrault: This reply will be of interest to all honourable senators. Yes, the Minister of Finance is committed to a new budget in the fall.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What will the deficit be?

Senator Flynn: Probably $30 billion.

ENERGY PRICES—INFLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Smith asked what proportion of the 656 per cent increase in world oil prices will flow to the federal treasury.

The increase in oil prices referred to relates to the increase over the 1973-81 period.

● (2030)

On page 77 of the NEP Update, federal revenues over the period 1981-86 are projected to be $36 billion, or 22 per cent of total revenues, down from a September projection of $61 billion, or 29 per cent of the total. The provinces' projected revenues are now $53 billion, or 32 per cent, and industry revenues are projected at $74 billion, or 46 per cent of the total.

Hon. G. I. Smith: What is the percentage? That is the question.

PROVISIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Roblin asked the following question: Does the budget statement on administered prices mean that the 6-per-cent rule will apply to telephone rates, hydro rates or the marketing boards in the province of Manitoba?

The Minister of Finance will ask federal agencies that regulate prices on goods and services, such as public communications and foodstuffs, to adhere to the price guidelines established in his budget. He clearly has no jurisdiction over provincial matters such as hydro rates.

Senator Roblin asked for the meaning of the new threshold limit on the small business review.

The threshold limit for the small business review has been raised to $5 million of assets and 200 employees. The third provision means that those investments which qualify for the small business review will generally not be subject to the full small business review except where important policy issues are raised.

Senator Roblin asked: What is the meaning of the statement on Canadianization?

The statement is quite clear. The government is ahead of its Canadianization goals—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: The government, I am pleased to say, is ahead of its Canadianization goals and, while it will not press the pace of Canadianization in the years immediately ahead, the 50 per cent target for 1990 remains.

Senator Roblin asked: What is the ratio of interest costs to income received? On a public accounts basis, the ratio of public debt charges to budgetary revenues is projected at 30.6 per cent in 1982-83. On a national accounts basis, the ratio of public debt interest to total revenues is projected at 25 per cent in 1982-83.

Honourable senators, I believe most of the questions asked concerning the budget have now been answered. There may be two or three others, to which I will attempt to provide answers later in the week.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—LIFTING OF SANCTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Flynn on June 22 concerning the ending of sanctions against Argentina.

I can confirm that Canada lifted the sanctions against Argentina on June 22.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The day I asked the question.

Senator Perrault: I would be pleased to table the press release of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on that subject. I propose that it be incorporated in today's record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The press release follows:)

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, announced today that the Government of Canada had decided to end its ban on imports from Argentina and to permit export credits for new transactions with that country.

The ban on imports and credits, announced on April 13, 1982, was imposed by Canada, in concert with the countries of the European Economic Community, against Argentina because of that country's violation of Article 2(3) of the United Nations Charter requiring member nations to settle their international disputes by peaceful means and because of Argentina's refusal to comply with the terms of Security Council Resolution 502 of April 3, 1982, which demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities and an immediate withdrawal of all Argentine forces from the Falkland Islands.

Dr. MacGuigan noted that the hostilities in the South Atlantic now appear to have ceased, the British had already returned to Argentina several thousand Argentine soldiers captured in the fighting and that the Argentine government has acknowledged on June 18, 1982, in a Note to the President of the UN Security Council that "in view of the present circumstances there is a de facto cessation of hostilities which Argentina is now observing". He hoped that this situation would be confirmed by further undertakings regarding a complete cessation of all hostilities and that the long-standing differences between Argentina and the United Kingdom would be settled by peaceful negotiations.

Dr. MacGuigan pointed out that a change in the current de facto cessation of hostilities would represent a new situation which could require the government to reconsider its position. He also noted, in this connection, that the Canadian embargo on all exports of military equipment to Argentina will remain in effect for the time being.

Effective June 22, 1982, steps are being taken to remove "Item 66: Goods of Argentine origin" from the Import Control List. In the meantime, the requirement for import permits continues; however, such permits will be issued freely on request pending the completion of the steps to remove Item 66 from the Import Control List.

THE BUDGET

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government to clarify one point in his answer to the first question, which concerned the interest on the present national debt?

Does the figure of $17.9 billion he quoted represent the forecast interest costs on the basis of the debt as set out at the time of the November budget, or does it take into account the additional $9 billion of deficit referred to in the budget of last week?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I provided that reply, I stated that the debt charges are now expected to reach some $17.9 billion. That, then, is the current best estimate.

THE SENATE

DEBATING PROCEDURE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Senator Neiman moves the third reading of this bill, I would say there was what seems to me to be a lack of understanding on the procedure respecting third reading.

The question arose when Senator Steuart moved the third reading of a bill, and a point of order was raised as to whether Senator Steuart, by merely making his motion, had thereby foreclosed his right to speak. I thought that we had come to an agreement that, as long as the senator moving third reading simply stands and says, "I move third reading of this bill," and then sits down, anyone could speak, including the senator who moved third reading, later in the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At any time.

Senator Frith: At any time. If that senator proceeds to speak, then he or she exhausts his or her right to speak on third reading. Of course, there would be no right of reply, as there is on second reading.

I want to be perfectly clear in my understanding that, by merely moving the motion, Senator Neiman is not foreclosing her right to speak on third reading, either immediately or later in the debate, in the event some other honourable senator wishes to speak on third reading.

Senator Flynn: Are you suggesting that there be a ruling?

Senator Frith: I am asking if there is still a misunderstanding. If there is, then I am asking for a ruling. If the Leader of the Opposition agrees, as I thought he did on the last occasion, that moving the third reading of the bill does not by itself constitute a speech, then there is no problem. However, if that is still questionable, then, yes, I am asking for a ruling before Senator Neiman speaks so that we understand, for the future, that a senator, by simply moving third reading, is not thereby making a speech that precludes him or her from speaking to the matter in debate on third reading.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Or the other way around, if the ruling is to the contrary.

Senator Flynn: The deputy leader puts it in a rather confusing way. The mere moving of third reading, in itself, does not constitute a speech, but if the mover, after having moved the motion and the motion is put by the Speaker, does not speak at that time, then I think he has indicated that he has nothing to say. That is the point I want to make.

If the sponsor moves third reading, he has to say at that time whether he wants to speak or not. If he does not, it means that he has nothing to say and he is not entitled to speak later on. It is not a right of reply.

Senator Frith: In that case, I think we should have a ruling. I do not feel it is correct to say that the senator who moves third reading must speak then or forever hold his peace. If that is so, I would be glad to be instructed by His Honour that that is the case, but it is not my understanding.

I think a senator can move third reading, sit down and, if no one else speaks, he can remain seated and can allow third reading to take place. Some other senator may rise and outline his concerns at third reading, in which case the sponsor can speak in the debate. The mere fact that he sat down and did not, so to speak, come out of the gate first, does not, in my opinion, mean that he cannot speak later.

If what Senator Flynn says is correct, then we will have to govern ourselves accordingly. However, I did not understand that the mover of third reading had to speak immediately, or forever hold his peace.

Senator Flynn: The deputy leader is asking for a ruling on a hypothetical case. I do not know if Senator Neiman intends to speak after moving third reading. If she wishes to speak immediately, then a ruling is not required. I do not like the idea of having a general, up-in-the-air ruling without any stated case.

Senator Frith: I agree with Senator Flynn, and I do not like the idea of a ruling up in the air for no other reason than an academic one. The reason I have brought the matter up is not academic. I am told that Senator Asselin wishes to speak to this bill on third reading. Senator Neiman would prefer to listen to what Senator Asselin has to say and then, as sponsor of the bill, speak later. This seems to me to be perfectly reasonable. In other words, she has moved second reading, the bill has gone to committee and has been reported without amendment. Therefore, if she, as sponsor, wishes to say, "Well, if no one else wishes to speak to it..."—well, I will leave it at that.

● (2040)

Senator Flynn: You are speaking for Senator Neiman at this point, are you?

Senator Frith: I am speaking to the non-academic point before us.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking for Senator Neiman.

Senator Frith: No, I am speaking for myself. Let me review the matter. First, I raised the question; then Senator Flynn said there was no reason to have a ruling on a purely academic point. I am saying it is not an academic point. The exact situation we are facing now is the question of a senator moving third reading and waiting to see if any other senator wishes to speak on the question. In this particular case that might mean Senator Asselin or someone else.

However, if we are saying that a sponsor of a bill, or any honourable senator moving third reading, must speak without waiting for anyone else to speak or he or she cannot speak later, then I think we should have a ruling. It is not an academic case. It will come up tonight, not academically, on Bill C-61.

Hon. Joan Neiman: On a point of clarification, honourable senators, Senator Donahoe and Senator Asselin have both been good enough to advise us that they would like to make a few comments on this bill. I am prepared to go ahead and speak now on moving third reading, but, as has been indicated by Senator Frith, I would prefer to hear their comments before making mine in closing the debate. Perhaps a ruling is required. I just took it for granted that, as I had already suggested to Senator Donahoe, I would defer to him and to any other honourable senator who wanted to speak, and speak later.

Senator Flynn: In essence, then, what the deputy leader is asking His Honour the Speaker to rule is whether the mover of third reading has a right of reply.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Flynn: That is exactly it.

Senator Frith: No, that is exactly not it.

Senator Flynn: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: This is why I say it is exactly not it.

Senator Flynn: Senator Neiman has just said it.

Senator Frith: There would only be the right of reply, if we assume that the mere moving of a motion constitutes an intervention by way of debate. If it does not, then that is not a right of reply but is simply a right to speak at any time in the debate, and a senator, therefore is not foreclosed from speaking by the mere fact that he or she does not speak immediately upon the order being called or the motion being put.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The debate is closed now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we know quite well what takes place on second reading. It is accepted that when the proposer of the motion speaks again that is the end of the debate and there is no reply. I refer to Rule 29:

A senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion or an inquiry shall have the right of final reply.

So the position is clear with respect to second reading. However, for third reading there is no specific rule, but I refer you to Rule 31, which states:

A senator who moves an order of the day or seconds a motion, but does not speak to it at that time, may address the Senate on the subject at any subsequent period of the debate.

Therefore, honourable senators, unless there is some other rule or jurisprudence that takes precedence, I say that according to Rule 31 Senator Neiman, even if she moves third reading, will have the right to speak again.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Mr. Speaker, that is not the case here, because Senator Neiman has not yet moved the motion. Let her move the motion, and, if a point of order is then raised, you can settle that point of order. At the moment there is no point of order before the Senate.

Senator Frith: Yes, there is.

Senator Asselin: The deputy leader has raised a point, but, in fact, there is no point of order before the Senate. Let us ask Senator Neiman to move the motion and then, if a point of order is raised or if she wants to speak after she has moved the motion, then, Mr. Speaker, you can make your decision.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not know how Senator Asselin can say that a point of order has not been raised. In fact, I have raised a point of order. Senator Asselin's point seems to be that he thinks the point of order should have been raised at another time. I point out to him that a point of order can be raised at any time. Here a point of order has been clearly and properly raised.

Senator Asselin: No point of order has been properly raised.

Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator Asselin, if he had been the one raising the point of order, would have raised it at a different time. That would have been his right. However, it is my right, and that of any other senator, to raise a point of order at any time. When it is raised, it is raised. It does not disappear just because it is not raised at the time Senator Asselin would like it raised.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, generally speaking, I think Senator Asselin is right that we should have a point of order before the Senate, if we want to deal with an actual problem. In this particular case the same problem occurred last week. It was exactly the same situation. It is simply because we had this problem last week—and it was a problem for me which I felt could quite likely occur again—that I say it is not purely academic.

In any event, if the preference is to wait until Senator Neiman moves her motion, I have no objection to that. I will make the same response I have already made, and I will ask those who think she is not entitled to speak to give their arguments.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, if I may speak to that same point, surely we have the right to ask for clarification in moving any motion at all. Is that not simply what we are asking at the moment? We are asking for some clarification from His Honour the Speaker.

Senator Asselin: No, we are not asking for that.

Senator Guay: I have been in this house for quite a while, and during all that time I have always understood that the mover of a motion also has the right to close the debate.

Senator Asselin: Only on second reading.

Senator Guay: Well, Senator Asselin, if you look at Rule 30, I think you will find that you have that right on third reading as well. Rule 30 states:

The final reply provided for in Rule 29 closes the debate. It is the duty of the Speaker to ensure that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

The Hon. the Speaker: I should advise honourable senators that it would be easy for the sponsor of a bill to avoid this kind of situation. If the sponsor really wants to speak on third reading, all he need do is have another honourable senator move third reading. That being the case, I do not see why we are making such an issue of the matter. All it requires is a change in technique. In other words, if Senator Neiman wants to speak on third reading, all she need do is ask another honourable senator to move third reading. Rule 30 concerns closing the debate on second reading, but we do not have a similar rule respecting third reading.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, you are saying that rule 31 applies to the situation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Senator Frith: That is satisfactory to me.

[Senator Frith.]

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the third reading of Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL TRAINING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Florence B. Bird moved the third reading of Bill C-115, to establish a national program for occupational training.

She said: Honourable senators, in moving third reading I realize that Senator Tremblay wishes to move an amendment. Perhaps he would care to do that now.

[Translation]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

In amendment, Senator Tremblay moved, seconded by Senator Doody, that Bill C-115 be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1) by replacing in the 7th line of paragraph (4) of clause 8 the words "consultation with" by the words "approval of"; and

2) by replacing in the 11th line of said paragraph the word "with" by the word "of".

He said: Honourable senators, personally, I am always intrigued by this kind of presentation, which is rather obscure on the face of it. I am handing in an English and French version of my motion to the Clerk. I have additional copies, in French and in English, for senators who may wish to read the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, Senator Tremblay moved, seconded by Senator Doody, that the bill to establish a national program for occupational training be amended as follows:

1) by replacing in the 7th line of paragraph (4) of clause 8 the words "consultation with" by the words "approval of"; and

2) by replacing in the 11th line of said paragraph the word "with" by the word "of".

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, considering the very obscure nature of the amendments I have just proposed, they are nevertheless complementary; and I think it would be useful to refer to clause 8 of the bill in question.

Clause 8 deals with agreements with employers. To save time, I think we could dispense with reading the clause itself. It is about providing occupational training which is, in fact, the subject of this bill. The clause also deals with agreements with other persons, in paragraph (2). These agreements will make it possible for another person to act on behalf of an employer or a group of employers where the latter are unable to provide the training referred to in the first paragraph of this clause. The third paragraph of the same clause deals with what is referred to in the margin of the French text—of course, this is not in the body of the text, but I would just like to point this out in passing—as “non-exclusion des provinces”, which in the English version reads as “provincial participation”.

I do not think there are any legal implications, but it seems to me there is a difference between the French and the English version in the marginal text, and it should be pointed out. Personally, I prefer the English rendering, where there is a positive reference to participation by the provinces. The French text refers to non-exclusion of the provinces.

That being said, I shall now go on to paragraph (4), where the proposed amendments would be made. This paragraph reads as follows:

The Commission may not enter into an agreement, other than an agreement with the government of a province, pursuant to subsection (1) or (2), unless the content of each course that is to be the subject of the agreement or the content of a course similar thereto has been the subject of consultation with the government of the province in which the course is given or is to be given or, in the case of a course given or to be given outside Canada, with the government of the province in which the adults to be trained in the course are employed.

The words “other than an agreement with the government of a province” are fairly obvious. There is an agreement. In French, this is rendered in the last sentence:

Le présent paragraphe ne s'applique pas aux contrats conclus avec le gouvernement d'une province.

Obviously, if the agreement is made with the government of a province, this implies the province has been consulted beforehand and also that it has given its consent.

That is exactly why I am proposing this amendment, because a province's approval, rather than just consultation, is involved.

First of all, and I shall try to be as brief as possible—it refers to the contents of the course given under one of the contracts provided in section 1, or in paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 2. It refers to the contents of the course.

Paragraph (4) specifies that the province concerned will be consulted about the contents of the course. Although not specifically mentioned, I imagine it will be through the joint committee set up, if I am not mistaken, under section 12. Such a joint committee, in the original version of the bill had an uncertain future if I may use that term. Fortunately, the amendments to that section and other sections of the same bill made in the other place have in some way assured the future of the joint committee which, as was the case in the legislation which will be replaced by this bill, will really have a role to play.

Consequently, keeping in mind the amendments made in the other place to the original version, it seems to me there is a question of coherence, in the overall economy of the bill, and the agreement of the provinces ought to be obtained concerning the programs referred to in clause 8 and mentioned in the subclauses. That is the first point I want to emphasize. It is a question of having some coherence with what has already been done after first reading in the other place.

Here is my second point. I have heard some comments in committee according to which, if the provinces had agreed to this, it would give rise to an unjustified series of administrative procedures because of the significant number of programs involved when the courses are offered by the employers, a group of employers or someone acting on behalf of the employers. Mention has been made of a sizeable number of such courses. In this respect I would point out that if the wording of subclause 4 is to be taken seriously, this problem of delays, this program of red tape—let us call things as they usually are—is already in place because, under subclause 4 of clause 8, consulting each of the provinces concerned is mandatory.

Therefore, all steps concerning that consultation will have been taken and the only difference between what I am proposing and what is already described in the text is the difference between consultation and approval. It is not a difference of procedure nor an additional step. It is indeed a fundamental difference. The argument about red tape is not valid. The only argument is that when it comes to educational courses of that nature, the federal commission is in a better position and must have a mandate which is different from the mandate of the provinces.

Those are programs of educational content. What happens—and this time I am looking at it from the point of view of the clients, the adults themselves—when they receive a program organized by their employer? I know what happens, having seen it very often during the years I spent in that sector. The employees are not satisfied just with recognition on the part of the employer simply because he sets up the course and that it will be related to their work. They know full well that, because of the many changes which occur and the ups and downs of the labour market, perhaps they will be looking for another job six months, one year or two years down the road. Should that ever happen, they insist that other employers must be made aware of the training they received from their first employer. This is where the provinces get into the act: the training given under programs provided in clause 8 must be recognized by employers other than the specific company for which the courses in question were prepared. It is not a matter of knowing whether a course must be set up and financed. Let us just say that is the responsibility of the commission since it foots the bill. But recognition of the training received must be portable, in the interest of the clients themselves who will be taking the course. The role of the provinces becomes essential with respect to recognition for the purpose of transferring to another employer.

With the text as it now stands, the provinces will have been consulted. I suggest that we go further in the direction already taken in other clauses so that the province can say that it recognizes or approves a given course in the interests of the clients themselves, of the workers who will receive a certain training in an industry, but who, if they change jobs, will need to have the qualifications they received in this course recognized.

Honourable senators, that is the purpose of my amendment. It aims at determining whether, in the interests of the workers themselves, the only authority able to define what I would call the portability of qualifications gained in this course from one industry to another will be guaranteed to the workers.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Tremblay for his courtesy. He gave me the text of his amendment last week and I have therefore had the time to examine it and reflect on it.

I have come to the conclusion that this amendment is not necessary because I believe that it would be a waste of money and would make the legislation less effective.

• (2100)

[English]

I can understand the honourable senator's concern, and I would share it had I thought there was any infringement of provincial rights or if there were any reason to be concerned about some of the points he raised. I should like to point out that the words "consultation with", which the proposed amendments would change to "approval of" appear in subsection 6(3) of the Adult Occupational Training Act, which is similar to clause 8(4) of Bill C-115. The words "consultation with" have been in the act since 1967 and have not created any problems, so it would be reasonable to assume that they will not create any problems in the future. It would, therefore, seem unnecessary for the Senate to hold up this important bill in order to make the verbal changes proposed in the amendment.

Clause 8(3), as I see it, really has nothing to do with clause 8(1) and (2). Under the Adult Occupational Training Act the federal government was not able to sign a contract for a province or a territory directly. Now we can treat them as any other employer because of clause 8(3). That is very important to the north, where the Crown is virtually the only trainer in industry.

As Senator Tremblay is well aware, the provinces decide on the content of institutional training programs. The federal government has no ability and, of course, no inclination to encroach on the constitutional right of the provinces with regard to education. Under this legislation all of the institutional programs must be attested by the province in which they take place, thereby giving the provinces what amounts to a veto on all curricula. The word "consultation" rather than "approval" in clause 8 is used to ensure desirable flexibility in the legislation. It is designed to avoid unnecessary red tape and a consequent waste of time and money regarding on-job training programs.

What happens is that there is consultation between the federal government and the provinces until agreement is reached on the substance of on-job training. After that, each and every small business that undertakes training will not have to wait for weeks or even months for a provincial stamp of approval on a program, but can go ahead right away.

In any case, I should like to point out to the Honourable Senator Tremblay that it is always possible that changes, such as the one put forward by him, may be included in an agreement. The agreements are bilateral, so it is advisable for the legislation to be broad and comprehensive enough to allow for minor changes in agreements after consultation. As the legislation now stands, no one will be tied unless they want to be tied.

The success of this new national training program will depend on the degree of co-operation between governments.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I had understood, though I may be wrong, that, having moved an amendment, I could speak on that amendment, as I have done; that Senator Bird could then speak on the amendment; and that I could then reply.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not think so, but we can find a way, if you wish.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: You can do so, with leave.

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, of course, I spoke before, but now I am speaking to the amendment.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, as I understand it, once I have replied to Senators Bird's comments she can then speak again to close the debate on third reading. At this stage, Senator Bird can speak on the merits of the amendment, as she is now doing.

Senator Frith: She is speaking to the amendment.

Senator Tremblay: After she has finished, I may speak on her comments. Does that conform with the rules?

Senator Frith: I do not think so, and I will tell you why. Certainly, I do not wish to cut off your desire to speak in this instance, but if you are asking for the rule and the procedure that cover the situation, it seems to me that a right to reply would not conform with the normal rule.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: As a general rule, one can speak only once on a motion or an amendment, except on second reading of a bill and a substantive motion or an enquiry. Those are the three exceptions when a reply is allowed. I believe that in this particular case, namely an amendment you can only speak once. The same principle applies to Senator Bird. She has the right to reply only in those three cases referred to in Rule 29; this is my understanding. You can perhaps raise a question but not under this rule.

[English]

Senator Tremblay: So, if I understand the honourable senator correctly, I require leave of the Senate to speak again on what Senator Bird has said. I am asking for leave.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: In due course.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Not now, because Senator Bird has not completed her intervention about the amendment.

● (2110)

Senator Bird: It seems very odd to interrupt me in the middle of my intervention in order to ask whether I am going to speak again. I usually say what I have to say in one speech, and I would hope that the honourable senator would let me finish what I am saying.

As I was saying when I was interrupted, the success of this new national training program will depend on the degree of co-operation between governments. Since co-operation is of vital importance to the whole country, for reasons that I went into at length when I presented Bill C-115—and I will not repeat them now—I find it hard to believe that it will not continue. All of the governments involved are aware that Canada must acquire a highly skilled work force as soon as possible, if we are to hold our own during a period of incredibly rapid technological change.

A great deal of intelligence and good will have gone into the drafting of the proposed legislation. Major worries by the provinces have been set at rest by amendments in the other place. The bill has been given thorough pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. The chairman has tabled a report without amendment explaining that several amendments were discussed with the minister and included in the amendments made in the other place. Since the Honourable Senator Tremblay is a member of the committee, he must certainly be aware of it.

Common sense and good reason tell us that the time has now come to pass Bill C-115 without amendment. It is time to give governments the money so that they can go ahead with the job.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: With leave, may I add a few words concerning the discussion I had with Senator Frith?

Senator Asselin: Is it agreed?

Senator Langlois: Agreed.

Senator Tremblay: Senator Frith said that I had leave to reply, but a point of order was raised.

I wanted to avoid asking the Chair for a ruling. What interests me basically is the substance of the legislation. I want to thank Senator Frith for allowing me to give my opinion on the substance rather than on procedural matters.

Senator Bird noted that in the present legislation the point with which my amendment deals is not covered, and she extrapolated by saying that, since this is already included in the legislation and since everything worked out in the past, everything would continue to work out in the future.

As a matter of fact, for the information of Senator Bird, everything has not worked out. The point I am raising is one of the major contentious issues concerning the application of the legislation passed in 1967 concerning occupational training provided by employers or a substitute of these employers. It is specifically to correct this weakness in the existing legislation which is repeated in the new legislation that I move this amendment, and I do so, as I have already emphasized strongly enough, I hope, in the interests of the clients themselves, of the workers. Everyone knows how vulnerable workers in a given industry are because of the present conditions, and how they can suddenly find themselves looking for another job. I have moved this amendment in the interests of those who have taken a course to become more qualified in the industry where they are now working, and I have done so at the request of the workers themselves. We have to provide accreditation which will allow the workers to transfer to another industry the qualifications they have acquired under section 8.

In this regard, and this is perhaps my most important point, unless the Commission becomes a kind of department of education able to recognize diplomas or qualifications, only the provinces can recognize qualifications officially. This can only be done through certification and not only through consultation. This is the point I wanted to make. It is up to the Senate to decide if the interests of the workers have priority over the small problems that this will mean with our work schedule in Parliament. It is up to the Senate to decide whether these small problems are more important than the interests of the workers who are asking for the recognition that only the provinces can give them.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall read the motion again:

In amendment, Senator Tremblay moved, seconded by Senator Doody, that the Bill to establish a national program for occupational training be amended as follows:

1) by replacing in the 7th line of paragraph (4) of clause 8 the words "consultation with" by the words "approval of"; and

2) by replacing in the 11th line of said paragraph the word "with" by the word "of".

All those in favour of the motion in amendment will please say yea

Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those opposed to the motion in amendment will please say nay.

Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

Motion in amendment negatived, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the main motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL PRIVACY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, June 30, 1982, the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for second reading of Bill C-43, to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I do not intend to say anything further on this order. If it meets the wishes of the Senate, I shall move the adjournment of the debate; otherwise I am quite prepared to yield to any honourable senator who wishes to speak on the order.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I intend to speak on this matter. I do not know, however, if I will say those things that Senator Donahoe might have said.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I am not sure, honourable senators, of doing justice to the importance of Bill C-43, which is of ambiguous significance. This is a bill to give the public freedom of information in matters of federal jurisdiction, such is the first purpose of the bill.

Second, it deals with the protection of privacy. Third, it proposes rules for these three purposes and restricts accordingly the Crown privilege, or immunity, in matters of evidence.

The sponsor of the bill, Senator Frith, spoke in my absence the other day, and I am sorry I could not be here to listen to him. I read his remarks, and I feel he did a very good job. He covered all the important aspects of the legislation, and is to be commended for this.

The history of Bill C-43 is quite long. The legislation itself was brought forward in July 1980 for first reading. That was two years ago or so. There followed a very long period of discussion in committee.

At times, it was felt it would die on the order paper. The government apparently was not very enthusiastic about it, and it even seemed it was hoping that certain provincial objections would give it an excuse to let the bill die.

Finally, the bill passed the House of Commons last week, just before Mr. MacEachen's famous budget speech—the last one, that is—by virtue of a compromise by opposition parties who were objecting to some kind of watering down brought or forced by the government, upon public opinion, mainly for the protection of cabinet documents, and with respect to the protection of privacy, so that it would not have to restrict—as it should, in my view—the use of the social insurance number.

Bill C-43, which received first reading in July 1980, had a predecessor in Bill C-15 which was put forward in November 1979 by Mr. Walter Baker, the then government leader in the House of Commons.

As Senator Frith explained, as Minister of Justice, I had to look into this bill with Mr. Baker. I am therefore interested in this bill and I note the absence of Senator Godfrey who had promised to keep a sharp eye on any bill which I might have sponsored directly or indirectly during my brief tenure as minister of justice. In any event, he may have the opportunity on third reading to give us his views which, in his opinion, are always relevant, if not in the opinion of the rest of the Senate.

This legislation, on the other hand, is similar to that which was passed by the U.S. government in 1964. For 18 years now, our American friends have been experimenting with this type of legislation. I believe it was last year that together with a group sponsored by the parliamentary centre of external affairs and trade, I went to Washington to meet with various groups responsible for implementing the freedom of information legislation in the United States. It is fair to say that they experienced a lot of ups and downs.

There is of course a great deal of public support, but there are also many administrative difficulties. It raises all sorts of problems, and it is not easy to draw the line between what should be allowed and what should not be in the matter of access to government information.

Here, in Canada, before Bill C-15 and Bill C-43, we had the crusades of Mr. Barry Mather, an NDP member sitting in the other place, and especially Mr. Gerald Baldwin, the then Progressive Conservative Party member for Peace River, who must be delighted to see the results of his efforts—maybe not exactly the results he may have wanted, but certainly a step in the right direction.

Commentators are of the opinion that we are faced with what could be called half a loaf. However half a loaf is better than no loaf at all. As for the part of the bill dealing with privacy, the Clark government had entrusted with Mr. Perrin Beatty who was then Minister of State, the responsibility of drawing up a bill to that effect. The bill was ready and was to be tabled when the government was defeated. Part of Bill C-43 dealing with that aspect of privacy is almost similar to the bill which was not tabled but was drawn up by the former government. The only exclusion is still the use of social insurance numbers.

Senator Frith: Except in one sense.

Senator Flynn: Except that in Mr. Beatty's bill under the Clark government, we had restricted the possible use of the social insurance number.

Senator Frith: Not in this one.

Senator Flynn: It is right. Access to government information has always received the support of various groups, especially that of the Canadian Bar Association and the Civil Rights Association. A spokesman for the Canadian Bar Association said he regretted that the bill protected cabinet papers in a way which could lead to abuses. Once again the conclusion was that it was better to have that legislation than nothing at all.

As for the arrangement I mentioned allowing the bill to be passed, it especially includes concessions made by the opposition about cabinet papers.

In that connection, I would like to refer to page 18856 of Commons Hansard of Monday last where Mr. Baker explained why he regretted the difference between Bill C-43 and Bill C-15 which he had introduced in 1979. I quote from page 18856 as follows:

• (2130)

[English]

Among other things, the government has left open the opportunity for one of the first initiatives of the next Progressive Conservative government. The Leader of the Opposition has said that it will be one of the first priorities of a Progressive Conservative government after the next election—and I ask the House to note my words—to reopen the whole question of access to information and to go back, hopefully, to the provisions of Bill C-15 so that we can do a number of things. We want to remove Clause 68 and reinstate Clause 21, with appropriate amendments, to reflect the relevant section in Bill C-15. We want to look at each one of the exemptions to see where they can be narrowed to bring them back at least to the position of Bill C-15. We should bear in mind that under Bill C-43 perhaps there will be a short period to gain experience that we can draw on. That is a priority. The Leader of the Opposition said that during the course of the annual meeting in my riding and I was delighted that he did. In other places across the country he has said, as I have, that it will be a priority of this government when it returns to office. If the Minister of Communications is still with us then, he will have an opportunity to use the improved legislation. In some ways the legislation was better. It was different in the broadness of the exemptions.

[Translation]

I quoted these remarks to show the basic difference between our party's position and that of the government. As far as the part of the bill that deals with privacy is concerned, the difference lies in the removal by the government of those provisions which restricted the use of the social insurance number to six specific cases. I might list them, but you can find them on page 1865 of Hansard of the House of Commons, in the speech by Mr. Perrin Beatty. At this stage, and given the compromise which made passage of this bill in the other place possible, it seems impossible for the Senate to bring about any substantial amendment or even to proceed to a thorough consideration in committee. The current situation and circumstances do not allow it. Should we decide to amend the bill, we would create a problem and we might delay forever consideration of this legislation.

The minister agreed that the bill might eventually be amended. The Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Frith, said the other day he agreed with my proposal to refer this bill to a committee next fall, when Parliament reconvenes.

Obviously, it will be the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I hope Senator Goldenberg will still be here to act as chairman of this committee. We shall be able then to consider the questionable parts of this legislation, in particular, thanks to the short experience we shall have gained by then, regarding the administration of this legislation.

In this context and with this formal commitment that we accept on this side of the House, we agree to second reading of this bill and not to refer it to a committee right now. We shall proceed to its third reading tomorrow or the day after or whenever the sponsor of this legislation decides to move third reading.

This is an important step. It is not as re-assuring as we might have wished on this side of the House. I think a huge step has been taken as regards the principle of access to government information and some principles concerning privacy and personal information which are guaranteed in this legislation. This is a good step forward. It is a step in the right direction. Moreover, if in the fall a Senate committee suggests some amendments that could be made to this legislation, we might convince the government to improve the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Honourable senators, I regret I did not mention in my speech the Honourable Gerald Baldwin who played such an important role in the making of this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: If I am not mistaken, it is the Act and not the bill that will be referred to the committee next fall.

Senator Flynn: That is correct.

Senator Frith: It will then be an Act. I would also like to thank Senator Flynn for his comments. I think there is agreement on second reading and a study of the Act in the fall, hoping that we will have gained some experience in the meantime.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stollery, seconded by the Honourable Senator

Anderson, for the second reading of the Bill C-108, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3)".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I had promised to speak tonight, but to inflict a second speech on you at this late hour seems to me to be totally unfair! Anyway, the subject matter of the bill is before the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce where the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is to appear tomorrow morning. Whether his appearance will inspire me to be more conciliatory or more aggressive, we shall see.

Senator Frith: As we say, a sweet talker.

Senator Flynn: But I think that in the circumstances, there would be no harm in postponing the debate until tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: It is always a pleasure to listen to you.

Senator Flynn: That is very kind of you.

On motion of Senator Flynn, order stands.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION OF CONGRATULATIONS TO GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the role of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to say on this motion at this time. Therefore, I yield to Senator Croll.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is Senator Croll closing the debate?

Hon. David A. Croll: That was the idea.

Senator Flynn: I do not know if this is an appropriate motion. It seems to me that we would do well to let this matter stand.

I would have worded the resolution differently, and, in those circumstances, perhaps I should have a word with Senator Croll to see whether we can come to some agreement in this regard.

I would not like to see this motion passed on division. In that spirit, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn is moving adjournment in the hope that he can have a discussion with the mover of the motion in an endeavour to come to an agreement on the wording. In the light of Senator Asselin's intervention and in the light of Senator Macquarrie's intervention, it seems that there is some room for unanimity on this question.

Senator Flynn: There could be.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask Senator Flynn if I am correct in my understanding that he took the adjournment of the debate in case someone else wishes to speak. Does he feel that we should issue an invitation to other senators to speak to this matter, or does he wish to speak to the matter now?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps we should try to correlate this item with the motion of Senator Phillips to which Senator Perrault moved an amendment. Both items deal with the same subject matter and, therefore, perhaps one should be eliminated.

Senator Frith: Perhaps the matter should be left for the moment.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications entitled: "Interim Report on Passenger Rail Service provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc."

Honourable senators, I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 4564.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 6, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-105, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 2, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. MCILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: I would ask honourable senators if they wish this bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day so that it may be considered with the other so-called energy bills.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is there to be Royal Assent this afternoon?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No.

Senator Flynn: Then, we will have third reading tomorrow.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

However, before the motion is adopted, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to say a few words in connection with this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator McIlraith: Bill C-105 proposes amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act. Your committee was particularly concerned with clause 8 of the bill, which replaces the present section 168(1)(c) of the act.

The new clause contemplates that shares may be constrained "in order to assist the corporation or any of its affiliates or associates to qualify under any prescribed law of Canada or a province to receive licences, permits, grants, payments or other benefits by reason of attaining or maintaining a specified level of Canadian ownership or control." The purpose of that provision is, of course, to assist those companies seeking to establish a high degree of Canadian ownership in order to increase their rights to benefits under other energy bills that have been enacted, and particularly the one dealing with the Petroleum Incentives Program.

The constraints would be permitted, under certain circumstances, in order to qualify under "any prescribed law of Canada or a province," whether or not the subject matter is related to energy. That point caused the committee some concern. In giving evidence at some length, the minister assured the committee that it was the express policy of the government that these provisions would only be available to the energy sector.

The Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association, in giving evidence before the committee, expressed several concerns. However, on examination by the committee, many of their expressed concerns were found not to be sustained by the actual wording of the clauses. As an example, they expressed concerns about retroactivity and the possibility of shares being sold without their consent.

Notwithstanding the concerns which were found not to be sustained, there still remains the concern that the proposed amendments to section 161(1)(c) respecting the application of the prescribed law of Canada for the purpose of receiving benefits under the National Energy Program by reason of their level of Canadian ownership were unnecessarily broad and that the objects and purposes of the National Energy Program could be achieved by limiting such prescribed laws to the energy sector.

In response to those concerns, the minister specifically undertook to review the wording of clause 168(1)(c) in order to determine whether this purpose could be achieved by specifying in the legislation the specific statutes of the government to which the provisions could be applicable. That undertaking was explicit and clear.

Difficulties arise if the problem is dealt with by way of trying to define the type of companies to which it would be applicable, because we now have in the energy field, as examples, distillery companies or railway companies with vast interests through subsidiaries or affiliates. Therefore, such amending clauses did not appear to be practicable, and specifying the legislation as expressed in the undertaking seemed to be the more logical and reasonable approach. It was felt that this approach was the most likely to bring about a satisfactory solution to the concern of such regulated industries as the insurance industry, and possibly other industries that are under tight regulation. This undertaking of the minister, coupled with his evidence in committee as to the policy of the government that these provisions were intended only to be available to the energy sector of the economy, dealt with this point adequately for the time being, and the committee therefore had no amendment to offer to the bill.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us what is in store for us for the remainder of this week? I understand that we shall sit tomorrow and Thursday, but what are the prospects for adjourning either this week or next?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I really have nothing new to add, but I can give more detail of the position as it was given last week. As I understand it, because of the new budget there are two bills the government wishes to have adopted before adjournment, and it has already presented them in the Commons. I refer to the extended borrowing authority legislation and to Bill C-124 relating to the reduction of indexing. With respect to the borrowing authority legislation, both Senator Roblin and Senator Flynn, during my intervention on the earlier borrowing authority, indicated that we could count on being asked to deal with that. Bill C-124 is an act respecting compensation in the public sector.

Apart from those two bills, which, as I have said, I understand the government will be asking Parliament to pass before adjournment, there is also the possibility that we will have to consider the ports bill I referred to on the last occasion this question was asked. However, as I say, that is only a possibility.

With respect to the business for this week, although some of the legislation we now have before us is at second reading stage, for the most part it is at third reading stage and it seems reasonable to expect that this week we will be able to clean up everything we now have before us. If we were then to receive the borrowing authority bill and Bill C-124 this week, it seems to me it would be worthwhile attempting to complete our consideration of both of them this week, even if it means sitting on Friday in order to do so. In that event, if those are the only two bills we can expect to receive, and if we are not going to be asked to deal with the ports bill, then we can leave, even if the other place decides to hold an extended adjournment debate. That need not affect us.

The other possibility, it seems to me, honourable senators, for next week is that if it seems we are not going to receive those bills—that is, if we clean up all the legislation we now have before us, and, in effect, are just waiting for bills from the other place—and I am open to advice on this subject, we might just as well simply come back when those bills are ready for our consideration.

In summary, honourable senators, then, there are two bills arising out of the budget, which is legislation that is not now before us but that we can expect, in the form of a bill for additional borrowing authority, plus Bill C-124. Then there is the possibility of the ports bill coming over, and a couple of other bills—for example, the government re-organization bill. There are, however, no strong messages on those to date. If we do not get those bills this week, my suggestion to the Senate will be that we simply adjourn and resume when those bills are ready for consideration.

While I am on my feet, honourable senators, I should also like to propose that, if we have third reading of some of the bills on the Order Paper, today or tomorrow, we have Royal Assent tomorrow afternoon, to dispose of them. There is, as Senator Flynn implies, and as I think we can reasonably infer, a real possibility that all the legislation before us now could easily be dealt with by tomorrow night.

Senator Flynn: That brings up the question as to whether we will sit on Thursday.

Senator Frith: The only other items on the Order Paper we might want to dispose of are the motion by Senator Phillips on the budget, with Senator Perrault's amendment, and, perhaps, certain other private motions, as we might call them. Nothing else occurs to me now that would require our sitting on Thursday, unless we are told that we may receive those bills on Thursday or Friday—that is, not only that we might receive them, but that we might be able to deal with them and have Royal Assent, or at least attempt to do so, this week.

It seems to me that if we are not going to be able to dispose of the legislation from the Commons this week there is no reason for us to sit on Thursday and Friday.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, I might be permitted to make a comment.

I understand that the ports bill is being dealt with by the equivalent committee in the other place, and while I cannot anticipate what this house might want to do by way of reference to a committee here, I suppose that, whatever committee it goes to, we will find ourselves faced with a bill which may be the subject of desired representations, at least, from widely scattered places throughout the country—from Victoria, I suppose, to St. John's, Newfoundland. Some time would therefore be required in order to make sure that an opportunity was given to people to be heard from widely separated parts of Canada, so that, whatever committee it was referred to, I would be inclined to think that it would not be something that could be done in a day or two.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is very helpful. I have not studied the bill. I know there is a good deal of interest in it, and, as I think Senator Smith and others will know, there is a good deal of pressure, if I can call it that, to have the bill passed; but I understand that there are some differences of opinion and some views to the effect that the bill needs some improvement. I am grateful, therefore, to Senator Smith for telling me that, in his opinion, there would be no chance of our having that bill passed without reference to committee. In effect, that is what he is saying, as I understand it, and that is of help to me in dealing with the government if they raise the question of what the Senate's approach would probably be to the bill.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to respond to that by saying that that is only my assessment from what I see happening in the other place. I have no means of knowing that the house would consider it appropriate to refer this bill to a committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I appreciate that it is only Senator Smith's opinion, but he is Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, so it is an opinion of some weight.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—DEFINITION OF "EXCEPTIONAL CIRCUMSTANCES"

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. Last week, I had an important question for him regarding the government's policy on rate increases, and I was referring in particular to the case of Bell Canada which intends to increase rates by 25 per cent in some cases and by 35 per cent in others.

I asked the Leader of the Government whether the federal government had decided to apply the standards provided by the Minister of Finance in his budget. As I mentioned last week, it seems the Minister of Communications is in favour of the rate increase, while another minister of the Crown said that like other companies, Bell Canada would have to comply with the guidelines given in the budget by the Minister of Finance.

I realize the Leader of the Government did not have enough time to answer my question. He was probably not prepared for it, and it is an embarrassing question for the government. That is why I gave him plenty of time to look into the matter and come up with an appropriate answer. In his budget, the Minister of Finance said, obviously referring to increases:

Accordingly, I am asking that federal agencies which regulate the prices for such vital goods and services as public transportation, public communications and food-stuffs, adhere to the objectives established tonight and depart from them only in exceptional circumstances.

I would therefore appreciate it if the Leader of the Government also gave us a definition of the exceptional circumstances referred to by the minister and could inform us whether—and I am getting back to last week's question—Bell Canada would qualify under this definition. Finally, what other cases would qualify as a result of the minister's statement on this important matter?

● (1420)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

THE ECONOMY

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the state of the economy. I wonder if the minister can shed some light on the recent announcement that the Government of Canada has seen fit to forgive Imperial Oil the $40 million loan for the Cold Lake project. It seems most unusual for the government to donate $40 million of taxpayers' money to a company that last year made a net profit of $465 million, while at the same time paying lip service to restraint and telling public servants that wage increases would be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent. Is the government's action regarding that $40 million in the same spirit of restraint?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Doody has, of course, got the salutation incorrect. However, he probably expects the Government of Canada to act in a way that honours its contracts and the agreements it has entered into. If he looks at the agreement that was made to keep the Cold Lake technical and other teams in place for a substantially longer period of time, he will find that what is being done is in keeping with the undertakings and obligations of the Canadian government. This government intends to honour its obligations.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary, can the minister tell me if the amount I mentioned was indeed a loan or whether it was a grant to Imperial Oil. If it was a loan, then presumably it should be repaid; if it was a grant, contingent on doing certain things, then perhaps it should not have been portrayed to the public as a loan.

● (1425)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there was, indeed, a loan agreement with very carefully worded terms of repayment. The carefully worded terms of repayment were to the effect that—and I think it is spelt out in the document, though I do not have it with me—if the project is revived or proceeded with within the time frame spelt out in the agreement, the loan will be repaid. Although I am not absolutely sure, I believe the time frame spelt out in the terms and conditions of the arrangement has now expired and, therefore, under the loan conditions, repayment is not called for.

Hon. Martial Asselin: So it is a loan resembling a grant.

Senator Olson: The terms and conditions were very clearly spelt out in the agreement and were explained by the minister directly responsible. I am sure that my honourable friend has the capability of upgrading his comprehension so that he can understand that.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it would be a challenge to the comprehension of anybody to try to understand the fiscal and economic policies of the Government of Canada at the present time. I certainly would not claim that capacity.

Senator Olson: That is why you are not in office, because you did not understand that when you were there.

Senator Doody: Can the minister tell us, if there are other such grants or loans donated to industry in the name of the mega-project and economic policy of the minister and of the government? How many millions of dollars have gone down the tubes in pursuit of that mega-project policy, which now appears to have collapsed?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is difficult to answer questions that are based on such completely false premises.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Lowell Murray: What does the Auditor General say about such matters?

Senator Olson: Anybody, such as my colleagues and me, who like to be precise and accurate when giving out information in response to questions, would have a great deal of difficulty with such questions that have a long preamble—

Senator Perrault: A murky preamble.

Senator Olson: —that contains assumptions that bear no relation to the facts or the opinions expressed in the past. I would like to demonstrate that. I do not think that any specific loans have been made with respect to the National Energy Program or other programs that have exactly similar terms and conditions as the one to which we have been referring. But I do know that terms and conditions have been attached to the granting of funds or loans-cum-grants if certain conditions are met, either positively or negatively, and that is not a new or unprecedented situation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why don't you answer the question?

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. With regard to these companies, would the minister tell us whether or not letters of comfort have been issued instead of loans or grants?

Senator Perrault: We are of great comfort to people all over the country.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is asking me to do some research. When my honourable friend refers to letters of comfort, he will also realize that letters of comfort can come in different degrees. This arrangement does not take the form of a letter of comfort. It was an advance of $40 million under certain terms and conditions.

I think there are many cases whereby the government has given support to industry in the energy sector and many other sectors by way of stating its policy and its attitude toward certain economic developments. If that falls within the definition of a letter of comfort which my honourable friend had in mind, then there are probably a number of such letters that have been issued from time to time over the years, and some of them may still be in existence.

INDUSTRY

DOME PETROLEUM LTD.—TERMS OF GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister be good enough to give us the terms of the advance of $100 million to Dome Petroleum Ltd. He might remember that we have discussed this topic on two or three occasions.

Hon. Martial Asselin: And he had no answer then.

Senator Walker: No, and I do not expect to get one today. I simply want to illustrate that the minister is useless in this chamber.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That's being diplomatic.

Senator Walker: He simply uses us as a punching bag, and he does not attempt to answer questions. This thing was in the air for three days, yet he gave us no intimation of it. He did not want any advice from the Senate. Did he simply go ahead and advance these hundreds of millions of dollars without consulting anyone? He has certainly not consulted the Senate on any of the many steps that he has taken.

● (1430)

I suggest that, as the months go on, his role as a minister in this chamber becomes less and less. He is an abject failure, as far as I am concerned.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can think of many ways of answering that assertion, and part of the assertion might have had a question in it, but I promised myself that I would not get down into the gutter with my honourable friend, and I intend to keep that promise.

Senator Walker: You are still a smart aleck, unable to answer any questions put to you. You just go off in a vitriolic diatribe and are oh, so satisfied about what you have done.

I just want it to be a matter of record that I think that you are useless, and the longer you remain here the more useless you become.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Where has parliamentary language gone?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think we should—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Olson: Take your seat when the Speaker rises.

Senator Walker: My apologies to you, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Charbonneau.

THE ECONOMY

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: I should like to address a further question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Now that we have received official reports of the June financial operations of the government to defend the Canadian dollar, in addition to the $750 million (U.S.) Eurobond issue, the $600 million (U.S.) in stand-by credits from domestic banks, and the $1 billion (U.S.) in stand-by credits from foreign banks, does the government intend to approach the International Monetary Fund to bolster its reserves, which are getting dangerously low?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the figures given by Senator Charbonneau regarding the amount of stand-by credit obtained in U.S. dollars is accurate. We have obtained $750 million (U.S.) from a bond issue in the Eurodollar market, $600 million (U.S.) in stand-by credits from Canadian banks, and $1 billion (U.S.) in stand-by credits from foreign banks.

If the Minister of Finance feels that he needs to take other measures to defend the Canadian dollar against what is normally referred to as a "run" on it, I am sure that my honourable friend will understand that a responsible Minister of Finance will do that at the time it needs doing.

It should be clear that these are exchanges from one currency to another, from Canadian currency to U.S. currency, and the stated position of the Minister of Finance, assisted by the activities of the Bank of Canada, has been that the dollar, in relation to U.S. funds, will find the level that the market demands, but from time to time when there are significant swings or movements, the bank will intervene to lessen the length or extension of those runs. I think that the Minister of Finance will continue to do that, but I do not believe he has announced any action in addition to what my honourable friend is already aware of.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question relating to the government's financial manoeuvres to support the Canadian dollar. I should like the minister to confirm, if he will, that the sum committed to the support of the Canadian dollar in recent times is approximately $2.4 billion. The minister has said that that represents a transfer of funds, in some respects, that it is not a direct cost to the government—

Senator Olson: It is a transfer from one currency into another.

Senator Roblin:—but what is a direct cost is the interest the government has to pay to support those transactions.

The reports in the press indicate that the interest payments—or a good portion of them—are over 16 per cent. I should like the minister to tell this house what the interest cost on a per annum basis is for the amount of money that the Canadian government has appropriated in one form or another in order to buy Canadian dollars and, thus, keep the Canadian dollar from sinking even lower than it has?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is leading into a fairly complicated set of figures, and he knows as well as I do that it is not as simple as that. It is not that we do not either collect interest or pay interest on the Canadian dollars. It is a fact that the amount of funds that are borrowed at any given time are required by the government and, indeed, the Bank of Canada. Actions to obtain such borrowings may occur at any time.

What happens is that there is a purchase, or in some cases a loan, in a particular currency, and almost all of the time in U.S. currency, so that we will have in our reserves a higher percentage of the kind of currency that is being demanded in exchange for Canadian dollars.

So, honourable senators, I am not disputing completely that there could be some additional interest charges as a result of this action, but of course it is, again, an exchange of one currency into another.

Senator Roblin: I presume my honourable friend undertakes to provide the information requested.

Senator Olson: Yes.

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—TOTAL COST TO TREASURY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should also like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question apropos some of the points made by my colleague, Senator Doody. Is it not correct that the total cost to the public Treasury for the Cold Lake fiasco was not $40 million but $50 million because the government had to take into the account the interest charges involved therewith.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I shall check into that, honourable senators. I am not too sure about that. The number I have off the top of my head—because I do not have the agreement with me—is that it was $40 million insofar as the agreement is concerned, but I shall take the question as notice to determine whether there were interest charges attached to that because it might have been paid after the agreement was made.

Senator Roblin: I can assure my honourable friend that no matter how he slices it, he will find an interest charge fairly close to $10 million.

ALSANDS PROJECT—REFINERY CAPACITY IN EASTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My next question has to do with the fact that the government also supplied some $6 million to buy themselves one month's time in respect to the Alsands proposal, even though it was obvious that that project was a non-starter.

Will my honourable friend please tell the house where that $6 million came from, and what rate of interest is being paid on it if it came about as a result of borrowed money?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall look into that for my honourable friend. There was an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta that they would take more time to consider an amendment to the proposals that were made to the Alsands consortium by both levels of government. I think that was, if my memory serves me correctly, during the month of April 1982. I am sure my honourable friend will recall that there were substantial amendments made by both levels of government as a result of those 30 additional days.

We know now that it was unacceptable to the consortium. On approximately April 21 or April 22, when those amended offers were made to the consortium, they did not accept them.

With a program as large as Alsands, and the amount of crude oil involved—something in the order of $13 to $15 billion—I am sure that my honourable friend will not criticize the spending of $6 million to give both levels of government further time to assess the situation.

Senator Roblin: It is not surprising that my honourable friend should illustrate the magnitude of his failure by telling us how much oil and gas from western Canada we are foregoing because of these flops.

[Senator Olson.]

I must say that my honourable friend and his associates have a positive genius for clambering aboard a sinking ship. I wonder what they are going to do in Montreal.

● (1440)

Could the minister tell me what the status is of the $200 million promised to major oil refiners in Montreal in order to induce them to band together to set up a plant to refine heavy oil or residual oil that they now have no use for? Would my honourable friend give me the timing? When was the $200 million offered, and when did the two important members of that consortium withdraw? Who is in the consortium now? Does the offer still stand, and, if so, where is the money coming from? Is it by tax rebate, or is it by those horrible loopholes that we have heard so much about—tax incentives—or is it going to be by direct government grant, or how?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is asking questions on matters on which he should have better recall than he is displaying here.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: If the leader applauds that, he will applaud anything.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows that there was, for example, a provision in the National Energy Program for an amount of funds—I am not sure that it was precisely $200 million—for modifications to the refinery capacity in eastern Canada so that they could, in fact, cope with the requirements of some of the residual oil, as he pointed out, that is not now useful and that the refiners are unable to refine to gasoline, diesel fuel, home heating oil and that sort of thing.

As to where the money was to come from, it was stated fairly clearly that that was provided for in the budget at that time.

Regarding the other details—as to where the offer is now, what its status is at this point in time, and so on—I will have to take that as notice because I do not have that information immediately on the tip of my tongue.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for taking those questions as notice. I presume the energy industry in Canada is pretty gun shy. Any time the government offers to help them out it is because they have a very, very sick horse on their hands, if I can use that kind of analogy, so I would not be surprised if they do not take my honourable friend up on it. In fact, I will be thankful if they don't, because it may be just another misdirection of public funds in the energy business.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend has fairly good retrospective vision, and I congratulate him for that. He can identify all of those things that have failed after they have failed, but I can tell him that a responsible government has an obligation, on a continuing basis, to look at industries that are having a difficult time, or, if there is a significant economic advantage to the country in being involved in it, it ought to be involved in it. I can also tell him that I also believe that he ought to know enough about the whole situation that he would not simply abandon a sick horse because it happens to be sick for a few days.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Where I come from and where this party stands is that we try to make sick horses well.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question on that same point, the failure of Alsands. Could the minister give us a calculation as to how much of the cost to the Canadian people could be attributed to the fact that the Alberta government refused to grant a licence for, I don't know how long—several months or perhaps a year?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is a known fact that the Alberta government refrained, or whatever the right word is, from issuing a licence for not only several months but, I think it was, almost two years, even during the period while my honourable friends opposite were in office—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson:—until they had come to an agreement with the federal and provincial governments. I would expect that it is fair also to say that the increased cost of the processing plant of Alsands and several others went up by nearly 20 per cent a year during that period of time, because I have been told—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson:—by the leaders of the Esso Resources project at Cold Lake, as well as the leaders of the Alsands project, that while the CPI was going up at about 11 or 12 per cent, their cost of construction was going up at approximately 20 per cent, for a variety of reasons that they could demonstrate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Shame!

Senator Olson: Therefore, it seems to me you could multiply—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Olson:—something close to 20 per cent times approximately 24 months, and that is what changed that project from an original cost estimate of somewhere around $8 billion or $9 billion to $14 billion to $16 billion.

Senator Steuart: I have another supplementary. Could there be any calculation—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Steuart:—as to how much that cost the taxpayers?

I don't blame senators opposite for shouting. You should be embarrassed. You should hang your heads. You were the government then, and you did nothing. You did nothing! You stayed in your seats and let this happen. In fact, had you made a deal with your own sister or brother government in Alberta, this thing would never have happened. We wouldn't have had the mess to clean up, of which I think we have done a pretty good job.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: Thank you very much. I just thought I would ask the minister if he could bring a calculation to the Senate of how much that cost the taxpayers. Also could he find out if at any time honourable senators opposite publicly asked any questions of their own government, and of the Government of Alberta, that they are asking now with great hindsight, with 20-20 vision, which they obviously did not have then?

Senator Perrault: They were too afraid.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Hon. Martial Asselin: The Minister of State for Economic Development is applauding!

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice, but I have to advise my honourable friends—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Asselin: He is applauding—with a $20 million deficit!

Senator Olson:—that I think it would be an exceedingly difficult research project to find out whether honourable senators opposite asked their government—

Senator Steuart: They never said a word.

Senator Olson:—any questions about—

Senator Steuart: They never said a word.

Senator Perrault: They never said a word.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You would say that—twin jokers!

Senator Roblin: When I heard the intervention of the honourable senator from Saskatchewan, I realized, when he raised his voice to the number of decibels he hit, that he must have a very weak argument because—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Roblin: If honourable senators will allow me to explain my point and then to refer to the minister with respect to it—

Senator Frith: Apology accepted.

Senator Flynn: The session lasted two months.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will wait until things settle down. I prefer being on my feet, in any case. Isn't the true fact of the matter that the whole problem with the Province of Alberta was exacerbated, the whole question of the division of the spoils between the two buccaneers in this field—

Senator Steuart: He wanted to be the leader, that's the problem.

Senator Roblin:—had to do with the National Energy Program?

Senator Asselin: Where is your party? You have no party.

Senator Roblin: The national energy policy is the basic—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Roblin: The national energy policy is the basic defect in the government's defence in this matter because it has not done any of the things it intended to do, and it has brought about the mess that Senator Steuart is referring to. If the Conservative Party, in the short time it was in office, is to be held accountable for any mess—and I suppose any government can be held accountable for anything that takes place when it is in office—how much more so will my friends opposite be held accountable for the mess they created with the national energy policy. If Senator Steuart would expand his question to the minister and ask the minister if he would please quantify the expenses that have been incurred by the government on the people because of the national energy policy, we might get closer to the fact. It was the national energy policy that held up the Alsands.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

An Hon. Senator: No, no.

Senator Frith: Oil prices.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Flynn: Certainly. It was a big lie that you told during the campaign.

An Hon. Senator: They are doing nothing about it.

Senator Roblin: You don't think so.

Senator Steuart: Unbelievable!

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: Just take it to the people of Canada, and we'll find out.

Senator Asselin: You are afraid to.

Senator Roblin: I must admit that I used an unfortunate expression in talking about the "sick" horse. The minister was right to rebuke me. The horse is not sick: it is dead; it is dead and its four feet are pointing to the heavens. That is what has happened to the policies of this government.

THE BUDGET

WESTERN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND—DEFERRAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Having dealt with the dead horse—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The horse on the payroll.

Senator Roblin: —I want to give the minister a little more to answer for.

I would direct the minister's attention to the fact that in the budget papers it was noted that the Western Economic Development Fund, with a $92 million appropriation for 1982-83, would be deferred. Will the minister please tell us what items of development in western Canada are adversely affected by this?

[Senator Asselin.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would just say a few words about the preamble to the question, and I am sure, if my honourable friend did not want me to respond to it, then he obviously would not have mentioned it.

I can find no relationship whatever between the NEP and the long period of time, from about May or so of 1979 to about February 1980, during which this was held up, because the NEP was not in existence at that time.

Senator Flynn: It was in existence from the time of the campaign.

Senator Olson: There was no NEP in existence.

Senator Flynn: Six months.

Senator Olson: More than six; it was about seven months, I believe, until October 30, 1980. Therefore, for my honourable friend to stretch his imagination to the point of saying that something which happened on October 30, 1980, had the effect of causing the withdrawal of permits and other necessary approvals for those two major projects, is stretching the matter beyond my comprehension. I cannot follow his reasoning that far.

Senator Flynn: That is not difficult.

Senator Olson: I want him to know, in no uncertain terms, that I do not agree with him that the oil industry, including the heavy oil and the tar sands, is a dead horse.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, sir.

Senator Olson: Together they are one of the greatest assets this country has.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): A Kentucky Derby winner.

Senator Olson: The tar sands contain over 900 billion barrels of oil, and comprise a natural resource that any country in the world would be proud to have as a reserve. They can produce oil whenever the costs and the demand get in line.

Senator Frith: That horse is alive and kicking.

Senator Olson: If that is a dead horse, then that is a different concept from the one I have.

The last point the honourable senator raised has to do with the matter of re-profiling the Western Development Fund. I will look for the exact details in that regard. Of course, only two priorities were announced in the budget of November 1981—funding for expanding the capacity of the western rail lines and economic development for the native peoples of that part of the country. I will get the exact amount. We are now, I think, in a position to identify that some $90 million of funding, but I do not want to be specific about this.

Senator Flynn: You are never specific.

Senator Olson: Oh, yes, in many cases I am far more specific than the questions.

It is pretty clear now that it took a little more time because of this government's concern to widely consult those people who would be affected by Crow rates, the expansion of that rail system, and the régime that will follow. Therefore, it is highly unlikely that all that funding could be used in fiscal year 1982-83. Therefore, there is some re-profiling of the amount, and I will bring more specific details to the house.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend telling us that the $92 million was related to the Crow?

Senator Olson: I am saying that the government made a commitment of $1.355 billion from the federal treasury, along with some other funding, so that the capacity of the rail system from the three prairie provinces, and in British Columbia, to export position could be significantly increased over the next four or five years. There are some financial conditions related to that insofar as putting together a financial package that would allow or motivate the railway companies to begin the investment of that kind of capital, which will be somewhere between $7 and $13 billion. The Crow rate has a relationship to all of that financing package, yes.

Senator Roblin: I take it that it has to do with the Crow. That is what the minister seems to be telling me.

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Roblin: I want to get back to the dead horse. I predict that it will never trot while this administration is in office, but I would not be surprised if it were revived by a new government.

I would hope that the new government would recognize the disastrous effect of the National Energy Program on cash flow and the relationship that has to the abandonment of oil projects in the Dominion of Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope that no government that can reach that kind of convoluted reasoning ever gets into office. If Senator Roblin believes what he has just said and would, therefore, discount the impact of the international prices, and the projections that were made on that involving a price of something over $60 a barrel and perhaps as high as $70 a barrel by the time that oil comes on stream, and that the whole international situation had turned around, and if he is not willing to give proper weight to that—that is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 99 per cent of the reason why this project and several similar high-cost-per-barrel oil projects are not going forward—then, certainly, there is no hope that a government made up of my friends opposite could ever come to the reality of this thing because they cannot see the real world.

Senator Perrault: They never have.

Senator Roblin: There is no hope in my honourable friends opposite at all, and the sooner they admit that then the better off we will all be.

If the government amended its National Energy Program, instead of taking the front-end money as it does, usually all the way through, and contented itself with taking a share of the profits after the profits were made, it would find the policy to be a lot more effective.

Senator Olson: That is my honourable friend's opinion, and he is welcome to it. However, it seems to me that he would be far better informed and far more in tune with the reality of the massive investments that are involved in all of this if he would adopt a somewhat more mixed feeling.

Senator Roblin: All the more reason the government should amend their policies that are effectively working to a very limited degree indeed.

If my honourable friend would summon up the courage to say, "Yes, a national energy program may be a good thing, but the way we are going about it is counter-productive," we would all be further ahead.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I simply cannot say that because I do not believe it.

Senator Flynn: They are happy with the situation as it is.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is happy with the situation, then there is nothing else I can add, but I would tell him that I do not think the majority of the country is.

Senator Flynn: The attitude is that nobody can do better than you.

Senator Perrault: What was the question again?

Senator Roblin: Why are you still in office; that is the question? Go!

Hon. G. I. Smith: They are afraid to go to the people; that is why they are still in office. That is an easy answer.

Senator Frith: Don't do us any favours.

Senator Smith: Speak up if you wish to be heard.

Senator Perrault: I didn't say a word.

Senator Smith: You didn't say a word. I admit it could have been a donkey's bray.

Senator Flynn: Reinforcements coming back.

Senator Perrault: You seem to be using the "horse" analogy an awful lot.

Senator Frith: We are getting a lot of manure from the other side.

THE ECONOMY

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. G. I. Smith: I do not mind, as Senator Steuart does, the honourable gentleman's recognizing when a minister is in distress and trying to help him by distracting attention. I do not mind that at all. That is a tactic they should employ more frequently.

● (1500)

I wish to direct the attention, if I may, of the honourable Minister of State for Economic Development to the exchange of question and answer, if it was an answer, which he had with my colleague, Senator Roblin, about the exchange rate and the borrowing from the Eurodollar pool in U.S. funds. As I understood him, he said that this was really just an exchange of funds from one currency to another, and to some extent I would certainly agree with him that there is an element of exchange in it. However, as I understand the matter of borrowing, whether it is in Eurodollars or in any other kind of dollars, when you borrow you pay interest. Obviously, therefore, there is an interest charge of a substantial rate on the money borrowed in Eurodollars to which the minister referred.

If all that borrowing was invested in equal funds at equal rates of interest, I could understand his argument that the income from the investment after the borrowing would offset some or all of the interest paid on the borrowing. I could understand that. But is he really telling us that all of this money was borrowed simply to hold it in reserve, either invested or otherwise, so as to give the government more flexibility? Is that what he wishes us to believe? Or was that money borrowed to be used for some purpose, whether the purchase of other currencies or something else?

If after considering that, if he is able to do so, will he tell us what is the difference, if any, between the rate of interest paid on the money borrowed by Canada and the rate of interest, if any, received by Canada from the proceeds of that loan, if it was invested?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, those are details of information I shall attempt to obtain for my honourable friend, but there are several things I could tell him today that might help him and others to understand this whole situation.

For one thing, the official foreign exchange operation, obviously performed by the Bank of Canada, is designed to counter temporary pressures in the foreign exchange market and thereby smooth erratic movements in the exchange rate. Since there was a substantial downward pressure on the Canadian dollar during June, there were sizable sales of U.S. dollars from official holdings. There is no question about that. Indeed, I am advised that there was a transfer from one currency to another in the amount of about $2.9 billion in the month of June, for example.

However, as I have said, I will try to obtain that more detailed information for my honourable friend. It may be a bit more complex than he realizes, because there are other considerations that go into the requirements of whether the government or the bank is paying interest on what they are holding. For example, there are such things as the sale of treasury bills every week. Of course, that is done on the basis of what is required from time to time for those reasons that are involved in all of that. It seems to me, therefore, that it is not correct to assume that the totality of the interest that may be paid on a loan of U.S. currency, or U.S. currency out of the Eurodollar reserve, is necessarily an addition to the debt service charges in total to the federal government.

Senator Roblin: Let's hope not!

[Senator Smith.]

Senator Smith: Well, I hope not. Just to relieve the honourable gentleman's fear of my complete ignorance on the subject, I may say that I listened more than once to the then Governor of the Bank of Canada explaining this to the assembled premiers of Canada, and I think I comprehended what he said. I don't suppose there is any difference in principle now as compared to then.

I am trying to find out from the minister whether there is a difference between the amount necessarily being paid out—one, of course, would assume it has not been paid yet—in interest on the money borrowed for this particular purpose and the income received from the proceeds of that borrowing. In other words, is there a net cost, a net outgo in interest, or is the outgo offset by the income in interest? If not, what is the difference? Which way does it ride?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice in order to be more precise about it. I think it would have the opposite effect, however.

THE BUDGET

PROVISIONS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I had intended to answer the question myself from what I believe to be my own knowledge, but in the interests of that high degree of accuracy recommended by the Minister of State for Economic Development I am putting the question to the Leader of the Government in the hope that he will be able to assist me.

If I may, I will preface my question by saying that in the course of a day or two I propose to leave these quarters in order to return to my native province. I expect that I will be greeted there by a great many questions concerning the quality and nature of the budget brought down by our co-provincial man, Mr. MacEachen, a week or so ago.

An Hon. Senator: A lovely man!

Senator Donahoe: The questions that I expect to be asked will be directed towards how much effective provision was made in the budget to save the money of the taxpayers of Canada. I began to think about that and I came to the conclusion that I knew that there were two things in the budget that could save us money. One was the limit put on the salaries of those in the public sector; the other was the limit put on certain public sector pension increases. One could see that both of those measures were likely to save the Canadian taxpayer money.

To come to my question, is there anything else in the budget that is intended to save the taxpayers money? I ask that question in the interests of those who, I know, will ask me for the answer when I return to my native province.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I hope that the honourable senator, when he returns to his great home and native province, will do his utmost, and expend all of his energies in the attempt, to convince the people of that province of the necessity to observe the guidelines suggested by the government. Were he to do so, he would perform a real service for his country.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Try to do it in B.C. and see what happens.

Senator Perrault: With respect to the targets of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, if the honourable senator, with his innumerable contacts in his home province—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And his eloquence.

Senator Perrault: —could persuade those in the public and private sectors to co-operate insofar as they are able to help in this fight against inflation, the nation would indeed, be indebted to him.

For our part, honourable senators, we have assiduously pursued every avenue in order to reduce spending and to exercise economy within our own sphere. As I stated last week, the truly major savings which are often asked for by the opposition can be found only in major reductions in the great social programs, and none of us would like to see those in great need deprived of the ability to fight inflation with adequate incomes.

I hope the honourable senator will make his visit to his home province next week a triumphal tour in support of this new program.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: In support of a new government.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. First of all, I would tell my honourable friend who has just spoken that in my province we have an old adage which goes: Once bit, twice shy. Well, we were "bit" in 1980. We received all kinds of promises and undertakings with respect to what fuel would cost and how the country would be run and how money would be saved. It is true that the man who headed the government was careful not to commit himself. He let the people take it on faith. The people did that, but "once bit, twice shy," and when I return to my province I will be going back to a province of hard-headed, wise thinking people, who will want to know facts, and who believe, as does the Minister of State for Economic Development, in having accuracy in facts. If I were to ask them to listen to any of the garbage that I listen to from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and take it as an assurance that they would not be "bit" again, I would deserve the kind of treatment that I would expect. I would deserve to be thrown overboard with a weight around my neck.

● (1510)

I do not expect that treatment, however, I expect to tell them the truth. I expect to tell them what things in the budget—and they are damned few—will save them any money. I will tell them that I cannot get a statement from my honourable friends opposite, and the best I have been able to do is to find only those two things. Moreover, I will tell them that I found that the nearly $20 billion deficit that was mentioned in the budget was a fake anyway, because nearly $2 billion—certainly more than $1.5 billion—was needed in order to bring some kind of order into the unemployment insurance fund. If those billions are added to the other billions we get a deficit of $21 billion.

Senator Frith: And the question is?

Senator Donahoe: And the question is, again: Are there any measures in the budget which I can tell the people of Nova Scotia will save money, other than the two simple measures I have mentioned?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Yes or no?

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I have a supplementary that the Honourable the Leader of the Government can answer while he is answering that question—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Wait for the answer to the first question.

An Hon. Senator: Order! Order!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that the honourable senator will strive to be non-partisan during his forthcoming visit to his province. This is a time for all of us to work together to help the nation. I suggest that the great body of information that I have brought to the chamber in the past week—and I urge honourable senators to review my responses to the questions that have been asked—may form the basis of some factual information that can be provided to the people of his province when he returns there. In the meantime, if the honourable senator has some questions that have gone unanswered in this chamber, perhaps he would let me know before he leaves for his home province, and together we could try to work out responses that will be of interest and value to the citizens of that province. This is an endeavour which, if we are successful, will turn the economy around and help all of Canada. I know that the honourable senator, regardless of our political differences, joins in that wish for the country.

Senator Donahoe: All I want to say is: Thank you for your invitation, but if the quality of the answers that I might elicit by asking you further questions is no better than the quality of the answers that I have received to the questions I have already asked, it ain't worth my time.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable the Leader of the Government would bring to this house the information regarding those—

Senator Marshall: What is your question?

Senator Steuart: Well, if I took as long to ask a question as some of the members on the other side of the chamber, we could all be retired before I got to the end of it.

I wonder if the Honourable the Leader of the Government would get the information as to how many of those fearless Conservative premiers of provinces, such as Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, had the nerve to come here and say, "We will go back to our provinces and put some kind of a 5 per cent or 6 per cent limit on our public service salary increases, and be real Conservative governments." I am sure the answer will be that there were only two of them who had the guts to go back and do that. All the rest of them did was come here and complain and blame the federal government. How many of them really came down here and said that they would go back and put a real limit on their civil service salary increases such as the federal government is prepared to do respecting the federal public service?

Honourable senators opposite may wave their hands all they want to, but these governments did not have the courage to do that, and they do not have it today.

Senator Flynn: How many Liberal governments are left?

Senator Perrault: There is a good deal of merit in Senator Steuart's question. It may be very difficult and very costly to undertake the research necessary to find any evidence of the kind of initiative he refers to, but the inquiry will go forward.

Hon. C. William Doody: Who is the minister in charge of soft ball?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a further question regarding the budget which I hope the Honourable Senator Donahoe will take back to Nova Scotia. The question was asked by Senator Roblin on June 29.

The question is to the effect that since the current estimate of financial requirements excludes the forecast shortfall in the unemployment insurance fund, will financial requirements not actually be some $2 billion higher than projected in the budget?

This is becoming a popular misconception. Financial requirements do include any deficit or surplus projected in the unemployment insurance account. The budgetary deficit, or surplus, is the difference between budgetary revenues and expenditures, which reflects only the government's own contribution toward unemployment insurance benefit payments. The net source of or requirement for funds provided by the unemployment insurance account, excluding the government's own share of benefits, is included in non-budgetary transactions. The sum of the deficit, or surplus, on budgetary transactions and the net source or requirement on non-budgetary transactions represents financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions. Consequently, the increased unemployment insurance account is included in financial requirements.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is moving to another question, so could I ask him a supplementary in respect of this? What is he trying to tell the Senate? Is he trying to tell the Senate that $2.2 billion is required to be raised by somebody, or not?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator wishes to ask a supplementary question I would be pleased to obtain a reply. I do not have the exact wording of the senator's original inquiry in this chamber, but I have provided an answer to that question.

Senator Roblin: If I can help my honourable friend, the point I was trying to make was that the budget figures showed a deficit of $19.6 billion, and yet there was an additional requirement of funds of some $2.2 billion for the Unemployment Insurance Fund. As I understand the answer given, my honourable friend is saying that that portion of the UI deficit which the government would make up is included in the $19 billion.

The leader's answer leaves the question of who pays the balance, and how much is it? It is going to have to be raised in one of several ways. Either the deficit will be increased to accommodate it, if the government takes it in. In that case the direct borrowings of the government will be increased by that sum, or else there will be an increase in the payroll taxes now paid by people who pay unemployment insurance—the employer and the employee. As far as the citizen is concerned, leaving the niceties aside, it is going to mean an increase in his taxes to pay for that. I want to know what the situation is.

Senator Perrault: I understand the question now. There is a possibility that there may be an increase in that payroll tax. But surely there is nothing wrong in the concept that during times of high unemployment those with employment, some of them in well-paid occupations, should make a contribution, along with other taxpayers, to the support of those who do not have jobs. I do not find the concept offensive, and surely the honourable senator does not.

Senator Roblin: I think there is a good point to be argued here. Is this an insurance fund, or is it not? If it is an insurance fund, then my honourable friend's observations do not apply. We know that people have been raiding this fund, if I can use that expression. The Minister of Immigration—I forget his correct title, but in any case, the minister in charge—has been allocating funds from the unemployment insurance bank, so to speak, for other mitigating policies, which, in themselves, may be good or bad—I am not debating that. I am simply saying that if it is an insurance fund, then the people who are the direct beneficiaries are the ones to be considered. The government has been transferring the cost of this fund successively over the last little while from the general revenue to the people who pay the payroll tax. I believe that has been going on. I am really trying to establish the facts, because it seems to me that if we have a shortage in the Unemployment Insurance Fund, that has to be made up by someone. If the shortfall is not included in the $19 billion—and some of it assuredly is not included in the $19 billion—then how much is included? Then the minister will be able to say not that there "may" be an increase in January but that there "will" be.

● (1520)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be made known in due time. An announcement is not yet ready with respect to a possible increase in UI payments by the working force and the employers of this country; but may I say that since its inception, during admittedly a very difficult period of time, the early years of unemployment insurance provided some real challenges for successive governments. There were abuses in some areas, but very largely those abuses have been corrected. We have in Canada today perhaps the best unemployment insurance program of any nation in the world, and every endeavour is made to place it on a sound actuarial basis; but during times of unusually heavy unemployment it is necessary to supplement payments to the unemployed. Surely no one in this chamber resents that concept. It is necessary to supplement those funds with additional moneys in order to help the unemployed in this country.

Interestingly enough, despite the line of Senator Roblin's questioning, I have yet to hear him question in this chamber the benefit levels available under the unemployment insurance program, because together with everyone on this side of the house he realizes the serious plight of many of those who are unemployed. Some of them are coming to the end of their benefit period.

Hon. G. I. Smith: When are you going to answer the question?

Senator Perrault: So, in due time announcements will be made with respect to employee unemployment insurance premiums and employers' payments. But this effort to help the economy calls for a co-operative endeavour by all Canadians.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows perfectly well that that was not the point of my question at all.

Senator Perrault: It was so.

Senator Roblin: I am not questioning the advisability of unemployment insurance.

Senator Perrault: You are asking where the money is coming from.

Senator Roblin: I am not questioning unemployment insurance as a policy. Who would?

Senator Perrault: I am glad to hear you say that.
